How the brokers got the tip that there was such a deal on foot, and took the way they did to shadow the three men, they never told. It was enough for them that they had vaulted at one leap from being men who bought and sold stocks to earn a living, to be many times millionaires. They paid the scientist the five hundred thousand dollars they had promised him, and the man went back to his laboratory to build another stronger and better machine, which, when it is finished is destined, no doubt, to amaze and delight the world with the possibilities of wireless telegraphy.

at her incredulously, and some laughing the little feminine laugh that is ever so much more disagreeable than any language.

"Or was," she added good naturedly, as she contemplated her ponderous portliness, and pleasantly laughed the disagreeable laughs of the few into a better humor. "I fancy," she went on, still contemplating her figure, "that if I tried to dive now, it would not much matter which way I went into the water, the splash would be about the same; but when I was ninewould be about the same; but when I was nine-teen, I only weighed a hundred and twenty pounds and I went into the water like a knife-blade. It was my ability to swim and dive that prevented my first romance from becoming a really dreadful tragedy."

"Oh, tell us about it," begged the others, not less interested now, than they were amused and incredulous before, and the heroine of her own story made herself more comfortable in the sand, and proceeded to gratify the curiosity of her companions.

sand, and proceeded to gratify the curiosity of her companions.

"At nineteen," she said, "I was pretty, so the men said, and rich, and my mother took me with her to Naples to spend the winter. You can imagine the kind of a time a rich American girl could have in a land of poor nobles aaxious to improve their fortunes; and that is the kind of a time I did have. But they were not all poor, and the most devoted of all was one who was very rich, as riches are measured in Italy. He was erratic, and so peculiar that he was known as the 'Mad Count.' Still he was brilliant and handsome, and though twenty-five years older than I, he was the most interesting man I had met in Europe. Possibly if—however, it was not to be, and it is too late to talk of what might have been."

The listeners smiled at the recognition of possibilities not dissimilar to their own experiences, and the story teller went on.

"During the entire winter his attentions increased, and at the first touch of spring he asked my mother and me to join a house party he was giving at his nicturesque country-seaf creased, and at the first touch of spring he asked my mother and me to join a house party he was giving at his picturesque country-seat on one of the islands not far from Naples. I was nervous about accepting the invitation, for the Count's manner was not reassuring, but there was no good excuse, and we just had to go. It was a lovely place this Isola Bella where the Count had his summer home, and we did have a simply divine time for the first few days. The Count was a perfect host, and if any of the The Count was a perfect host, and if any of the men among his guests were his rivals, he gave no sign. Neither did he trouble me with the men among his guests were his rivals, he gave no sign. Neither did he trouble me with the attentions I disliked in the city. Suddenly, though, and by no apparent design, the romance gave place to the tragedy.

"One afternoon, while the others were enjoying their siestas, I slipped away with my sketching materials to a point presenting a view that stirred all my poetic and artistic sentiment. As I sat absorbed in the exquisite combination of sea and mountain and sky, I saw the Count coming up the narrow path from the sea below, and remembered that he alone knew of my escape to this quiet nook he had selected on the day of our arrival for my 'especial artistic delectation', as he said. I did not want to see him and wondered why he came uninvited, but I could not run away, or hide, and was compelled to receive him politely. He apologized and asked if he might share the view with me, and this being granted, he ast down and began talking of the island and its many interesting physical features; particularly the remarkable sea-caves at the base of the cliffs, some more beautiful than the famous Blue Grotto of Capri. I was astonished that he made no love to me, and when he asked if I would like to take a row under the cliffs and see what a wonderful water-colorist and sculptor nature was, I consented without a word, except that we be back within an hour. In a small cove at the foot of the cliff-path we found two boats fast at a small dock and getting into one we rowed out upon the bosom of the tideless sea. I loved the water and rowing, and I had the oars.

sea. I loved the water and rowing, and I had the oars.

"We had rowed and drifted about for half an hour, perhaps, when he asked me to pull in closer to the clift, and he would show me the entrance to one of the caves he had told me of. He was laughing and complimenting me on my skill with the oars, and I was enjoying the water as a sea nymph might. As we neared the cliff at a point for which he told me to row, he held up his hand warningly and I stopped rowing. Under the shadow of the great grey wall above us, the smile left his face, his compliments ceased, and he became very grave. I knew well enough what was coming, and I tried to divert it by a constant chatter about the cave, implying a doubt of its existence, and chaffing him for being so poor a pilot. He let me go on, his eyes sparkling but shifting from side to side in a way that means but one thing, and then he interrupted me with an impetuous the oars. side to side in a way that means but one thing, and then he interrupted me with an impetuous declaration of his love, and a fierce demand that I should marry him. I was stunned by the suddenness of it, and sat as dumb as an oyster, simply staring at him and clutching the oars as if they were lifepreservers. When my wits returned and he had subsided somewhat, I tried to reason with him, and explain that I did not love him and could not marry him, but did not love him and could not marry him, but did not love him and could not marry him, but in the midst of my argument he stood up in the boat before me with such a strange glitter in his eyes that I became thoroughly frightened. "I did not know what to do, but instinctively rose to my feet to meet him face to face, and as I did so, he caught me in his arms, and plunged overboard with me. He did not know that I could swim, but his ignorance was of no advantage to me for he was a powerful man and held me so firmly that I could not possibly break his hold. I tried to scratch his eyes out, but he easily avoided my hands by thrusting his face close against the side of my neck, and as he did this, he bore my head backward into the water. Then I felt myself sinking and with one effort to scream, the water filled my mouth, there was a flash of dazzling light, a quick pain and a suffocation, followed by a restful sense of floating through a limitless blue sky, and all was dark.

"Consciousness ended there, and I knew no more until I opened my eyes in what seemed to "Consciousness ended there, and I knew no more until I opened my eyes in what seemed to be a room of silver walls and sapphire floor. It was all very vague and indistinct, but some one was administering a stimulant very pleasant in its effect, though I did not know why. Gradually I began to gather strength of mind and body, and as I did so I realized where I was and how I had gotten there. I knew it was the Count giving me brandy or some other stimulant, and chafing my hands, and I became so angry that I quite forgot all my fear. I poured out the vials of my wrath on the man, but he laughed at me in my weakness, and told me he was going to keep me there till I promised to marry him. He assured me that he would return to my mother and offer his services in the

I do just as I say. Over half a million people have secured my treatment in that way, and 39 out of each 40 have paid for it because they were cured. Not a penny is accepted if it fails.

There are 39 chances in 40 that I can cure you. No matter how difficult your case, I take the entire risk, for those half million cases have proved what my remedy can do.

My way is to strengthen the inside nerves. I bring back the nerve power which alone makes each vital organ do its duty. No other remedy does that; and in most chronic diseases there is no other way to get well. Don't let doubt or prejudice keep you from asking about it.

"I shall never regret," she had said, "that I am an expert wimmer and diver."

"Oh!" they unanimously exclaimed, looking the said of the s tion in which I found myself that what had taken place seemed to be a terrible dream, and I think I must have fainted, for when I again realized where I was the effects of the drowning had passed away, and I came to myself with much more strength than I had when the Count took his unexpected departure. I was dazed, however, and as I sat up and tried to collect my scattered senses, I saw the Count's silver flask lying on the floor, where I had dashed it from his hand in my first recognition of him in his efforts to revive me. There was half a pint of brandy remaining in it and I took a liberal drink of it. Being unused to it I soon began to feel its effects, and I began to 'pull myself together' as the newspapers say and tried to think. I am sure you will all easily understand that my position was an awful one for any woman, but for a girl of nineteen, never out of sight of her mother, and shielded at every tion in which I found myself that what had and tried to think. I am sure you will all easily understand that my position was an awful one for any woman, but for a girl of nineteen, never out of sight of her mother, and shielded at every turn, it was something inexpressible. But I was blessed with a pretty good hard head, and it was not long until I began to gather my forces and facts and arrange them as a lawyer-general might. I might, in the first place, have remembered that I could not be forced into a marriage, and could have given a promise and gotten out. But I never thought of that, because I thought of another plan of escape before that one suggested itself.

"I saw that the cave was similar to the Blue Grotto of Capri which I had visited, but that the entrance was several feet below the surface of the water and only approachable from either side by a diver who knew its exact location. The opening was quite large and plainly visible from the inside of the cave which received its light from it. I had no sooner arrived at this point in my thinking than it occurred to me that I was probably as good a swimmer and diver as the Count was, and if he had no trouble getting out of the cave, I should not. To think was to act, and throwing off my dress, and fastening my skirts about me so as not to impede my movements, and tying my shoes about my neck, I took a stiff jorum of the brandy, and, with a little prayer to be led happily out of all my afflictions I got as near to the entrance as I could and dived for the opening shining far down in the water like a silver arch leading to Heaven. But my spirit was stronger than my flesh, and when I came to the surface after staying under the water until I thought I should burst, I only bumped my head on the overhanging rocks and was forced to come back into the cave. Some women might have cried at that, and I felt like it, but my strength was increasing, and the mere sense of it encouraged me so that I sat down on the rocks again and calmly waited for more herest. head on the overhanging rocks and was forced to come back into the cave. Some women might have cried at that, and I felt like it, but my strength was increasing, and the mere sense of it encouraged me so that I sat down on the rocks again and calmly waited for more breath. I made another trial, less successful than the first, because I bumped my head harder, and caught a throatful of water that weakened me agreat deal. I was so tired now that when I dragged myself out on the rocks again, I sank down quite exhausted, and presently fell into a doze. How long I slept I do not know, but when I awoke I was more eager than ever to try the water. But the light of the day was dying, for when I looked toward the entrance I could barely see it through the shadows, and with a great gulp in my throat I gave way and throwing myself down on the hard stones I cried like any woman would. It was not so much over my failure, or through fear of the Count, but simply because I was going to have to stay in that horrid cave all night. I was soaking wet and hungry; the place was dark and dismal; I had no bed to sleep on, there were a dozen things I was not used to and the personal discomforts quite outbalanced any thought of the real horrors of the situation.

"Goodness only knows how I passed that dreadful night, but I did, crying sometimes for my mother, laughing sometimes with hysterics, and sleeping not a little between times, for I was tired enough. I knew when I was roused suddenly from one of these naps, the sunlight was shining brilliantly through the archway of my escape, and I jumped to my feet and began to get ready for the work before me. Another jorum of the brandy, and a half hour's exercise in my almost forgotten calisthenics to take the stiffness out of my joints and I stepped out to my diving point. The arch showed clear, as if inviting me to come, and with my lungs filled to their utmost and all the strength I could command, I flung myself headforemost into the water. I dove with all my might and swam with the energ the entrance and rose to the surface outside, so close to the cliff that my foot touched it as I struck out in swimming.

"I felt that I was safe from the Count now, but a new danger confronted me. The Count had our boat to take him away when he came from the cave, but I had nothing but the wide open sea before me and a perpendicular wall hundreds of feet in height at my back. It was a mile to the little dock where I had taken the boat the day before, and I could not swim that distance. What lay around the point of the cliff in the other direction only a few hundred yards away, I did not know, but I swam for it, staying close to the cliff so that if my strength gave out I might cling to life a little longer. You know one at nineteen thinks life is quite worth living. worth living.

"Around the point, which I weathered safely, was a stretch of beach which I soon made. was a stretch of beach which I soon made, and putting on my shoes burried along for half a mile where I found a woman mending a fish net, near the water. The cliffs sloped away leaving room for a fisherman's cabin. "An hour later the whole island knew of my "An hour later the whole island knew of my strange adventure, and until we were ready to take the boat to Naples, the whole police force of the island was required to keep back the friendly islanders who wanted to congratulate me on my escape. I had no brain fever, nor any pneumonia, as the doctor said I ought to have, but I did have an attack of nervous prostration that lasted for weeks. Nor did the Count attempt to kill himself or do anything desperate when arrested. He simply laughed desperate when arrested. He simply laughed and held out his hands to be pinioned, and from that time until he died, five years later, he was a harmless lunatic crooning always to himself in a sing song monotone: "What has become of her?" What has become of her?"

A HOUSE ON MADISON AVENUE.

"I am not well, Florence. I sometimes doubt if I shall ever be any better."
"Surely, uncle, you cannot mean——"
"Yes, my child, I have reason to believe that I am nearing the end."
"I cannot bear to hear you speak so, uncle," said Florence Linden, in irrepressible agitation. "You are not an old man. You are but fifty-four."

"True, Florence, but it is not years only that make a man old. Two great sorrows have embittered my life. First, the death of my dearly loved wife, and next the loss of my boy,

"It is long since I have heard you refer to my cousin's loss. I thought you had become reconciled—no, I do not mean that, I thought your regret might be less poignant."
"I have not permitted myself to speak of it, but I have never ceased to think of it day and night."

night."

night."

John Linden paused sadly, then resumed:

"If he had died, I might, as you say, have become reconciled; but he was abducted at the age of four by a revengeful servant whom I had discharged from my employment. Heaven knows whether he is living or dead, but it is impressed upon my mind that he still lives, it may be in misery, it may be as a criminal, while I, his unhappy father, live on in a luxury which I cannot enjoy, with no one to care for me—"

Florence Linden sunk impulsively on her knees beside her uncle's chair.

"Don't say that, uncle," she pleaded. "You know that I love you, Uncle John."

"And I, too, uncle."

There was a shade of jealousy in the voice of Curtis Waring as he entered the library through the open door, and, approaching his uncle, pressed his hand.

He was a tall. dark-complexioned man, of pressed his hand.

He was a tall, dark-complexioned man, of perhaps thirty-five, with shifty, black eyes and thin lips, shaded by a dark mustache. It was not a face to trust.

Even when he smiled the expression of his face did not soften. Yet he could moderate his voice so as to express tenderness and sympathy. He was the son of an elder sister of Mr. Linden, while Florence was the daughter of a younger brother.

Both were orphans, and both formed a part

Both were orphans, and both formed a part f Mr. Linden's household, and owed everything to his bounty.

Curtis was supposed to be in some business downtown; but he received a liberal allowance from his uncle, and often drew upon him for outside assistance.

As he stood with his uncle's hand in his, he was, necessarily brought near Florence, who instinctively drew a little away, with a slight shudder indicating repugnance.

Slight as it was, Curtis detected it, and his face darkened.

John Linden looked from one to the other. "Yes," he said, "I must not forget that I have a nephew and a niece. You are both dear to me, but no one can take the place of the boy I have lost." have lost."
"But it is so long ago, uncle," said Curtis. It must be fourteen years."

"It is fourteen years."
"And the boy is long since dead!"
"No, no!" said John Linden, vehemently.
"I do not, I will not, believe it. He still lives, and I live only in the hope of one day clasping him in my arms."

"That is very improbable, uncle," said Curtis, in a tone of annoyance. "There isn't one chance in a hundred that my cousin still lives. The grave has closed over him long since. The sooner you make up your mind to accept the inevitable the better." The drawn features of the old man showed that the words had a depressing effect upon his mind, but Florence interrupted her cousin with an indignant protest.

"How can you speak so, Curtis?" she exclaimed. "Leave Uncle John the hope that he has so long cherished. I have a presentiment that Harvey still lives."

John Linden's face brightened up.
"You, too, believe it possible, Florence?" he said, eagerly.
"Yes, uncle, I not only believe it possible, but probable. How old would Harvey be if he still lived?"
"Eighteen—nearly a year older than your Eighteen-nearly a year older than yourself.

"How strange! I always think of him as a little boy."
"And I, too, Florence. He rises before me in his little velvet suit, as he was when I last saw him, with his sweet, boyish face, in which his mother's looks were reflected.

"Yet, if still living," interrupted Curtis, harshly, "he is a rough street-boy, perchance serving his time at Blackwell's Island, a hard-pred young ruffing when it would be hitter serving his time at Blackwell's Island, a hardened young ruffian, whom it would be bitter mortification to recognize as your son."

"That's the sorrowful part of it," said his uncle, in s voice of anguish. "That is what I most dread."

"Then, since even if he were living you would not care to recognize him, why not cease to think of him, or else regard him as dead?"

"Curtis Waring, have you no heart?" demanded Florence, indignantly.

"Indeed, Florence, you ought to know," said Curtis, sinking his voice into softly modulated accents.

"I know nothing of it," said Florence, coldly.

"I know nothing of it," said Florence, coldly,

"I know nothing of it," said Florence, coldly, rising from her recumbent position, and drawing aloof from Curtis.

"You know that the dearest wish of my heart is to find favor in your eyes. Uncle, you know my wish, and approve of it, do you not?"

"Yes, Curtis; you and Florence are equally dear to me, and it is my hope that you may be united. In that case, there will be no division of my fortune. It will be left to you jointly."

"Believe me, sir," said Curtis, with faltering voice, feigning an emotion which he did not feel—"believe me, that I fully appreciate your goodness. I am sure Florence joins with me—""

"Florence can speak for herself," said his cousin, coldly. "My uncle needs no assurances from me. He is always kind, and I am always grateful."

John Linden seemed absorbed in thought.
"I do not doubt your affection," he said;
"and I have shown it by making you my joint heirs in the event of your marriage; but it is only fair to say that my property goes to my boy, if he still lives."

"But, sir," protested Curtis, "is not that likely to create unnecessary trouble? It can never be known, and meanwhile—"

"You and Florence will hold the property in

"Have you so specified in your will?" asked Curtis.

"Have you so specified in your will?" asked Curtis.

"I have made two wills. Both are in yonder secretary. By the first the property is requesthed to you and Florence. By the second and later, it goes to my lost boy in the event of his recovery. Of course, you and Florence are not forgotten, but the bulk of the property goes to Harvey."

"I sincerely wish the boy might be restored to you," said Curtis; but his tone belied his words. "Believe me, the loss of the property would affect me little, if you could be made happy by realizing your warmest desire; but, uncle, I think it only the part of a friend to point out to you, as I have already done, the baselessness of any such expectation."

"It may be as you say, Curtis," said his uncle with a sigh. "If I were thoroughly convinced of it, I would destroy the later will, and leave my property absolutely to you and Florence."

"No, uncle," said Florence, impulsively, "make no change; let the will stand."

Curtis, screened from his uncle's view, darted a glance of bitter indignation at Florence.

"Is the girl mad?" he muttered to himself. "Must she forever balk me?"

"Let it be so for the present, then," said Mr. Linden, wearily. "Curtis, will you ring the

"Let it be so for the present, then," said Mr. Linden, wearily. "Curtis, will you ring the bell? I am tired, and shall retire to my couch early."

"Let me helpyou, Uncle John," said Florence,

ing.
"As you please," she answered, coldly.
"Will you be seated?"
"Will you be seated?"

"Will you be seated?"

"No; our interview will be brief."

"Then I will come to the point. Uncle John wishes to see us united."

"It can never be!" said Florence, decidedly. Curtis bit his lip in mortification, for her tone was cold and scornful.

Mingled with his mortification was genuine regret, for, as far as he was capable of loving any one, he loved his fair young cousin.

"You profess to love Uncle John, and yet you would disappoint his cherished hope!" he returned.

"I set his cherished hope?"

"There is no doubt of it. He has spoken to me more than once on the subject. Feeling that his end is near, he wishes to leave you in charge of a protector."

"I set his cherished hope?" "I can protect myself," said Florence, proudly.

"You think so. You do not consider the hapless lot of a penniless girl in a cold and selfish world."

"Penniless?" repeated Florence, in an accent of surprise.

"Yes, penniless. Our uncle's bequest to you is conditional upon your acceptance of my

"Has he said this?" asked Florence, sinking

"Has he said this?" asked Florence, sinking into an armchair with a helpless look.
"He has told me so more than once," returned Curtis, smoothly. "You don't know how near to his heart this marriage is. I know what you would say: If the property comes to me, I could come to your assistance, but I am expressly prohibited from doing so. I have pleaded with my uncle in your behalf, but in vain."

Florence was too clear-sighted not to pene-

Florence was too clear-sighted not to penetrate his falsehood.

"If my uncle's heart is hardened against me," she said, "I shall be too wise to turn to you. I am to understand, then, that my choice lies between poverty and a union with you?"

"You have stated it correctly, Florence."

"Then," said Florence, rising, "I will not hesitate. I shrink from poverty, for I have been reared in luxury, but I will sooner live in a hove!——"

"Or a tenement house," interjected Curtis, with a sneer.

"Yes, or a tenement house, than become the wife of one I loathe."

"Girl, you shall bitterly repent that word!" said Curtis, stung to fury.
She did not reply, but pale and sorrowful, glided from the room to weep bitter tears in the seclusion of her chamber.

of his cousin with a sardonic smile.

"She is in the toils! She cannot escape me!" he muttered "But"—and here his brow darkened—"it vexes me to see how she repels my advances, as if I were some loathsome thing! If only she would return my love—for I do love her, cold as she is—I should be happy. Can there be a rival? But no! we live so quietly that she has met no one who could win her affections. Why can she not turn to me? Surely I am not so ill-favored, and, though twice her age, I am still a young man. Nay, it is only a young girl's caprice. She shall yet twice her age, I am still a young man. Nay, It is only a young girl's caprice. She shall yet come to my arms, a willing captive."

His thoughts took a turn, as he rose from his seat and walked over to the secretary.

"So it is here that the two wills are deposited!" he said to himself—"one making me a rich man, the other a beggar! While the last a rich man, the other a beggar! While the last is in existence I am not safe. The boy may be alive and liable to turn up at any moment. If only he were dead—or the will destroyed.

Here he made a suggestive pause.
He took a bunch of keys from his pocket and tried one after another, but without success. He was so absorbed in his work that he did not not here the extreme of a dark-house. notice the entrance of a dark-browed, broad-shouldered man, dressed in a shabby corduroy suit, till the intruder indulged in a short cough, intended to draw attention.

Starting with guilty consciousness, Curtis turned sharply round, and his glance fell on the intruder.

"Who are you?" he demanded, angrily. "And how dare you enter a gentleman's house unbidden?" "Are you the gentleman?" asked the intruder, with intentional insolence.
"Yes."

"You own this house?"
"Not at present. It is my uncle's."
"And that secretary—pardon my curiosity-

"Yes; but what business is it of yours?"

"Yes; but what business is it of yours?"
"Not much. Only it makes me laugh to see a gentleman picking a lock. You should leave such business to men like me."
"You are insolent, fellow!" said Curtis, more embarrassed than he liked to confess, for this rough-looking man had become possessed of a dangerous secret. "I am my uncle's confidential agent, and it was on business of his that I wished to open the desk."
"Why not go to him for the key?"
"Because he is sick. But, pshaw! Why should I apologize or give any explanations to you? What can you know of him or me?"
"More, perhaps, than you suspect," said the

"Then you know, perhaps, that I am my uncle's heir?"

"Don't be too sure of that."

"Don't be too sure of that."

"Look here, fellow," said Curtis, thoroughly provoked, "I don't know who you are nor what you mean, but let me inform you that your presence here is an intrusion, and the sooner you leave the house the better!"

"I will leave it when I get ready."

Curtis started to his feet, and advanced toward his visitor with an air of menace.

"Go at once," he exclaimed, angrily, "or I will kick you out of the door!"

"What's the matter with the window?" returned the stranger, with an insolent leer.

"That's as you prefer; but if you don't leave at once I will eject you."

By way of reply, the rough visitor coolly seated himself in a luxurious easy-chair, and, looking up into the angry face of Waring, said:

"Oh, no, you won't!"

"And why not?" asked Curtis, with a feeling of uneasiness for which he could not account.

"Why not? Because, in that case, I should seek an interview with your uncle, and tell "What?"

"That his son still lives; and that I can re-

The face of Curtis Waring blanched; he staggered as if he had been struck; and he cried out, hoarsely:

"It is a lie!"
"It is the truth, begging your pardon. Do you mind my smoking?" and he coolly produced a common clay pipe, filled and lighted it.
"Who are you?" asked Curtis, scanning the man's features with painful anxiety.
"Have you forgotten Tim Bolton?"
"Are you Tim Bolton?" faltered Curtis.
"Yes, but you don't seem glad to see me."

Yes; but you don't seem glad to see me."

"I thought you were—"
"In Australia. So I was, three years since.
Then I got homesick, and came back to New

"You have been here three years?"
"Yes," chuckled Bolton. "You didn't suspect it, did you?"
"Where?" asked Curtis, in a hollow voice.

"Where?" asked Curtis, in a hollow voice.
"I keep a saloon on the Bowery. There's my card. Call round when convenient."
Curtis was about to throw the card into the grate, but on second thoughts dropped it into

"Is alive and well. He hasn't been starved.
Though I dare say you wouldn't have grieved much if he had."

"And he is actually in this city?"
"Just so."

"Does he know anything of—you know what I mean."

"He doesn't know that he is the son of a rich man, and heir to the property which you look upon as yours. That's what you mean, isn't it?"
"Yes. What is he doing? Is he at any work?"

"He helps me some in the saloon, sells papers in the evenings, and makes himself generally useful."

Has he any education?" "Has he any education?"
"Well, I haven't sent him to boarding-school or college," answered Tim. "He don't know no Greek or Latin or mathematics,—phew, that's a hard word! You didn't tell me you wanted him made a scholar of."
"I didn't. I wanted never to see or hear from him again. What made you bring him back to New York?"

Curtis, sternly.
"There's worse things than breaking your promise," retorted Bolton.

Scarcely had he spoken than a change came over his face, and he stared open-mouthed behind, and beyond Curtis. Startled himself, Curtis turned, and saw, with Startled himself, Curtis turned, and saw, with a feeling akin to dismay, the tall figure of his uncle standing on the threshold of the left portal, clad in a morning-gown, with his eyes fixed inquiringly upon Bolton and himself.

AN UNHOLY COMPACT.

"Who is that man, Curtis?" asked John Linden pointing with his thin finger at Tim Bolton, who booked strangely out of place, as with clay pipe, he sat in the luxurious library on a sumptious chair. "That man?" stammered Curtis, quite at a loss what to say.

"He is a poor man, out of luck, who has applied to me for assistance," answered Curtis, recovering to me for assistance," answered Cursis, recording to me for assistance," answered Cursis, recording this wits.

"That's it, governor," said Bolton, thinking it necessary to confirm the statement. "I've got five amali children at home almost starvin', your hour."

"That is sad. What is your business, my man?"

It was Bolton's turn to be embarrassed.

"My business?" he repeated.

"That is commendable; but don't you know that it is very ill-bred to smoke a pipe in a gentleman's it is very ill-bred to smoke a pipe in a gentieman's house?"

"Excuse me, governor!"

And Bolton extinguished his pipe and put it away in a pocket of his corduroy coat.

"I was just telling him the same thing," said Curtis. "Don't trouble yourself any further, uncle. I will inquire into the man's circumstances, and help him if I can."

"Very well, Curtis. I came down because I thought I heard voices."

John Linden slowly returned to his chamber and left the two alone.

"The governor's gettin' old," said Bolton. "When I was butler here fifteen years ago, he looked like a young man. He didn't suspect that he had ever seen me before."

"Nor that you had carried away his son, Bolton."

"Who hired me to do it? Who put me up to the job, as far as that goes?"

"Hush! Walls have ears. Let us return to husi-ob, as far as that goes?"

"Hush! Walls have ears. Let us return to business."

"That suits me."
"Look here, Tim Bolton," said Curtis, drawing up a chair and lowering his voice to a confidential pitch, "you say you want money?"
"In course I do."
"Well, I don't give money for nothing."
"I know that. What's wanted now?"
"You say the boy is alive?"
"He's very much alive."
"Is there any necessity for his living?" asked Curtis, in a sharp, hissing tone, fixing his eyes searchingly on Bolton, to see how his hint would be taken.

"Is there any necessity for his living?" asked Curtis, in a sharp, hissing tone, fixing his eyes searchingly on Bolton, to see how his hint would be taken.

"You mean that you want me to murder him?" said Bolton, quickly.

"Why not? You don't look over scrupulous."

"I am a bad man, I admit it," said Bolton, with a gesture of repugnance, "a thief, a low blackguard, perhaps, but, thank heaven! I am no murderer! And if I was I wouldn't spill a drop of that boy's blood for the fortune that is his by right."

"I didn't give you credit for so much sentiment, Bolton," said Curtis, with a sneer. "You don't look it, but appearances are deceitful. We'll drop the subject. You can serve me in another way. Can you open this secretary?"

"Yes, that's in my line."

"There is a paper in it that I want. It is my uncle's will. I have a curiosity to read it."

"II understand. Well, I'm agreeable."

"If you find any money or valuables you are welcome to them, I only want the paper. When will you make the attempt?"

"Tomorrow night. When will it be safe?"

"At eleven o'clock. We all retire early in this house. Can you force an entrance?"

"Yes; but it will be better for you to leave the outer door unlocked."

"I have a better plan. Here is my latch-key."

"Good! I may not do the job myself, but I will see that it is done. How shall I know the will?"

"Usu have a better plan. Here is my latch-key."

"Good! I may not do the job myself, but I will see that it is done. How shall I know the will?"

"Suppose I succeed, when shall I see you?"

"I will come round to your place on the Bowery. Good night!"

Curtis Waring saw Bolton to the door, and let him out. Returning, he flung himself on a fauteuil.

"There is an element of danger in the boy's presteuil.

"I can make that man useful," he reflected.

"There is an element of danger in the boy's presence in New York; but it will go hard if I can't get rid of him! Tim Bolton is unexpectedly squeamish, but there are others to whom I can apply. With gold everything is possible. It's time matters came to a finish. My uncle's health is rapidly failing—the doctor hints that he has heart disease—and the fortune for which I have been waiting so long will soon be mine if I work my cards right. I can't afford to make any mistakes now."

CHAPTER IV.

FLORENCE.

Florence Linden sat in the library the following evening in an attitude of depression. Her eyelids were swollen, and it was evident she had been weeping. During the day she had had an interview with her uncle, in which he harshly insisted upon her yielding to his wishes, and marrying her cousin. Curtis.

'But, uncle," she objected, "I do not love him."

"But, uncle," she objected, "I do not love him."
"Marry him and love will come."
"Never!" she said, vehemently.
"You speak confidently, miss," said Mr. Linden, with irritation.
"Listen, Uncle John. It is not alone that I do not love him. I dislike—I loathe—him."
"Nonsense! that is a young girl's extravagant nonsense."

nonsense."
"No, uncle."
"There can be no reason for such a foolish dislike. What can you have against him?"
"It is impressed upon me, uncle, that Curtis is a bad man. There is something false—treacherous—about him."
"Pooh! child!

about him."

"Pooh! child! you are more foolish than I thought. I don't say Curtis is an angel. No man is; at least, I never met any such. But he is no worse than the generality of men. In marrying him you will carry out my cherished wish. Florence, I have not long to live. I shall be glad to see you well established in life before I leave you. once, I have not long to live. I shall be glad to see you well established in life before I leave you. As the wife of Curtis you will have a recognized position. You will go on living in this house, and the old home will be maintained."
"But why is it necessary for me to marry at all, Uncle John?"

"You will be sure to marry some one. Should I divide my fortune between you and Curtis, you would become the prey of some unscrupulous fortune between your and curting between the prey of some unscrupulous fortune between tune-hunter."
"Better that than become the wife of Curtis War-

"See, you are incorrigible," said her uncle, angri-

"See, you are incorrigible," said her uncle, angrily. "Do you refuse obedience to my wishes?"
"Command me in anything else, Uncle John, and I will obey," pleaded Florence.
"Indeed! You only thwart me in my cherished wish, but are willing to obey me in unimportant matters. You forget the debt you owe me."
"I forget nothing, dear uncle. I do not forget that, when I was a poor little child, helpless and destitute, you took me to your arms, gave me a home and have cared for me from that time to this as only a parent could."

as only a parent could."
"You remember that, then?"
"Yes, uncle. I hope you will not consider me wholly ungrateful."

"It only makes matters worse. You own your obligations, yet refuse to make the only return I desire. You refuse to comfort me in the closing days of my life by marrying your cousin."

home."
"Oh, uncle, you do not mean that?" exclaimed Florence, deeply moved.
"I do mean it, and I shall not allow your tears to move me. Not another word, for I will not hear it. Take twenty-four hours to think over what I have said."

Florence bowed her head on her hands, and gave herself up to sorrowful thoughts. But she was interrupted by the entrance of the servant, who an-

"I hope I see you well, Miss Florence," he simpored pered.

"Thank you, Mr. de Brabazon," said Florence coldly. "I have a slight headache."
"I am awfully sorry, I am, upon my word, Miss Florence. My doctor tells me it is only those whose bwains are vewy active that are troubled with headache."

bwains are vewy active that are troubled with headache."

"Then, I presume, Mr. de Brabazon," said Florence, with intentional sarcasm, "that you never have a headache."

"Weally, Miss Florence, that is vewy clevah. You will have your joke."

"It was no joke, I assure you, Mr. de Brabazon."

"I—I thought it might be. Didn't I see you at the opewa last evening?"

"Possibly. I was there."

"I often go to the opewa. It's so—so fashionable, don't you know?"

"Then you don't go to hear the music?"

"Oh, of course, but one can't always be listening to the music, don't you know. I had a fwiend with me last evening—an Englishman—a charming fellow, I assure you. He's the second cousin of a lord, and yet—you'll hardly cwedit it—we're weally vewy intimate. He tells me, Miss Florence, that I'm the perfect image of his cousin, Lord Fitz Noodle."

"I am not at all surprised."

"Weally you are yow kind. Miss Florence.

"I am not at all surprised."

"Weally, you are vewy kind, Miss Florence. I thought it a great compliment. I don't know how it is, but evewybody takes me for an Englishman. Strange, isn't it?"

"I am very glad."

"May I ask why, Miss Florence?"

"Because—Well, perhaps I had better not explain. It seems to give you pleasure. You would, probably, prefer to be an Englishman."

"I admit that I have a great admiwation for the English character. It's a gweat pity we have no lords in America. Now, if you would only allow me to bring my English fwiend here—"

"I don't care to make any new acquaintances. Even if I did, I prefer my own countrymen. Don't you like America, Mr. de Brabazon?"

"Oh, of courth, if we only had some lords here."

"We have plenty of flunkeys."

"That's awfully clevah, on my word."

"Is it! I am afraid you are too complimentary. You are vewy good-natured."

"I always feel good-natured in your company, Miss Florence. I—I wish I could always be with you."

"Really!" Wouldn't that be a trifle monotyou." "Really!" Wouldn't that be a trifle monotonous?"

"Not if we were married," said Percy, boldly breaking the ice.
"What do you mean, Mr. de Brabazon?"
"I hope you'll excuse me, Miss Florence—Miss Linden, I mean; but I'm awfully in love with you, and have been ever so long—but I never dared to tell you so. I felt so nervous, don't you know. Will you marry me? I'll be awfully obliged if you will."

will you marry me? I'll be awfully obliged if you will."

Mr. de Brabazon rather awkwardly slipped from his chair, and sunk on one knee before Florence.

"Please rise, Mr. de Brabazon." said Florence, hurriedly. "It is quite out of the question—what you ask—I assure you."

"Ah! I see how it is." said Percy, clasping his hands sadly. "You love another."

"Not that I am aware of."

"I cannot encourage you, Mr. de Brabazon. My heart is free, but it can never be yours."

"Then," said Percy, gloomily, "there is only one thing for me to do."

"What is that?"

"I shall go to the Bwooklyn Bwidge, climb to the parapet, jump into the water, and end my misewable life."

"You had better think twice before adopting

"You had better think twice before adopting such a desperate resolution, Mr. de Brabazon. You will meet others who will be kinder to you than I

"I can never love another. My heart is broken. Farewell, cruel girl. When you read the papers to-morrow morning, think of the unhappy Percy de Brabazon!" Mr. de Brabazon folded his arms gloomily, and Mr. de Brabazon folded his arms gloomily, and stalked out of the room.

"If my position were not so sad, I should be tempted to smile," said Florence. "Mr. de Brabazon will not do this thing. His emotions are as strong as those of a butterfly."

After a brief pause Florence seated herself at the table, and drew toward her writing materials.

"It is I whose heart should be broken!" she murmured; "I, who am driven from the only home I have ever known. What can have turned my uncle against me, usually so kind and considerate? It must be that Curtis has exerted a baleful influence upon him. Icannot leave him without one word of farewell."

She took up a sheet of paper, and wrote rapidly:

She took up a sheet of paper, and wrote rapidly:

"Dear Uncle—You have told me to leave your house, and I obey. I cannot tell you how sad I feel, when I reflect that I have lost your love, and must go forth among strangers—I know not where. I was but a little girl when you gave me a home. I have grown up in an atmosphere of love, and I have felt very grateful to you for all you have done for me. I have tried to conform to your wishes, and I would obey you in all else—but I cannot marry Curtis; I think I would rather die. Let me still live with you as I have done. I do not care for any part of your money—leave it all to him, if you think best—but give me back my place in your heart. You are angry now, but you will some time pity and forgive your poor Florence, who will never cease to bless and pray for you. Good-by!

She was about to sign herself Florence Linden, but reflected that she was no longer entitled to use a name which would seem to carry with it a claim upon her uncle.

The tears fell upon the paper as she was writing, but she heeded them not. It was the saddest hour of her life. Hitherto she had been shielded from all sorrow, and secure in the affection of her uncle, had never dreamed that there would come a time when she would feel obliged to leave all behind her and go out into the world, friendless and penniless, but poorest of all in the loss of that love which she had hitherto enjoyed.

After completing the note, Florence let her head She took up a sheet of paper, and wrote rapidly:

"I see you are incorrigible," said John Linden, stormily. "Do you know what will be the consequence?"

And so she slept on till the French clock upon the mantel struck eleven.

Five minutes later the door of the room slowly opened, and a boy entered on tip-toe. He was roughly dressed. His figure was manly and vigorous, and despite his stealthy step and suspicious movements, his face was prepossessing.

He started when he saw Florence.

"What, a sleeping gal!" he said to himself. "Tim told me I'd find the coast clear, but I guess she's sound asleep and won't hear nothing. I don't half like this job, but I've got to do as Tim told me. He says he's my father, so I s'pose it's all right. All the same I shall be nabbed some day, and then the family'll be disgraced. It's a queer life I've led ever since I can remember. Sometimes I feel like leaving Tim and settin' up for myself. I wonder how 'twould seem to be respectable."

The boy approached the secretary, and with some tools he had brought essayed to open it. After a brief delay he succeeded, and lifted the cover. He was about to explore it, according to Tim's directions, when he heard a cry of fear, and turning swiftly saw Florence, her eyes dilated with terror, gazing at him.

"Who are you?" she asked, in alarm, "and what are you doing there?" (See illustration front page.)

Mr. Tiffany has not been in active business for some years, but his sons carry on his business for some years, but his sons carry on his business in his name. The stamp of "Tiffany" on all kinds of gold and silver jewelry, glass and other works of art, is a sure sign of superiority. Mr. Tiffany left a fortune of millions.

19. The fastest trotting horse ever known is Cresceus owned by George H. Ketcham of Ohio. His record is two minutes, two and a quarter seconds, and Mr. Ketcham is his own driver. In the six years he has been trotting he has won in purses $102,851.50, or over $17,000 a year. Mr. Ketcham is naturally proud of his great horse, and it is something to own the fastest trotter the world has known.

20. Since early September of last year, the whole Christian world has been disturbed by the capture of Miss Ellen Stone, a missionary, by Bulgarian brigands who held her and her companion, Madame Tsilka, for a ransom put at one hundred and twenty thousand dollars. Being an American missionary the Protestant churches of this country immediately set to work to raise the money. It was not an easy task, but something over sixty thousand dollars was forwarded to Consul Dickinson, and after months of negotiating the brigands accepted the amount and Miss Stone and Madame Tsilka were released and restored to their friends. No other women have had such an experience as theirs. experience as theirs.

Still in the shadow of her husband's tragic death, the widow of President McKinley sorrows in her quiet home at Canton, Ohio, but she is trying to smile again, and chief among the friends who cheer her most are the three children who live in a pretty house near her own. They are Ramona, Dorothy and Wanna Smith, aged twelve, ten and five. Dorothy is the favorite and often drives with Mrs. McKinley when she visits her husband's grave. The children's father is a clergyman and was a close friend of the late President.

24. When Melville W. Fuller of Chicago was appointed Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court by President Cleveland, and came to make his home in Washington, there were eight daughters in his family, who made the home of the Chief Justice a gay gathering place for society, though three of the daughters were yet in school. Now all of them are marked ried except the youngest, Miss Frances, whose picture is given here, and we may expect her soon to follow in the footsteps of her sisters, for she is a very pretty girl.

DEAR SIR: Permit me to say that to reduce the tax on beer and tobacco and to leave untouched the tariff on Cuban productions would be an act discreditable to the country that tolerates it, a disgrace to the parties in or out of Congress that, directly or indirectly, are responsible for it and an outrage upon the Cubans, whom we have made so loud a pretence of defending.

April, fickle April, is here once more. ashered in by "April Fools' Day," a day dear to all American young people, and, to tell the truth, to many who are "older and wiser grown." Whence came the custom of playing tricks or "fooling people" on this particular day no one seems to know. Some think it derived from an ancient pagan custom, such as the Hull Festival among the Hindoos or the Roman Feast of Fools; and still others that it is only a polite recognition of a delicate tribute to the changeable character of the month. geles, Cal., the sixth biennial session of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, which will be largely attended by delegates from every portion of the Union.

The organizations which met in Washington the past month were the National Daughters of the American Revolution, the Woman Suffrage Association, the National Council of Women, and the National Mothers' Congress. All were largely attended and great interest was manifested in the sessions.

Perhaps none of the societies of women have a grander or more lofty motive than the Daughters of the American Revolution. The object of this association is to maintain and preserve the patriotic history of by-gone days; to instill into the souls of the present and succeeding generations a love and veneration for the tried and true heroes who fought the battles of the country in the days of old, when England sought to subjugate and forever control the people of the American Colonies. ed Women, which has ten thousand members; Mrs. Hannah G. Solomon of Chicago, president of the National Council of Jewish Women, and Mrs. Zina Young Gates of Utah, who is a daughter of the late Brigham Young, the former head of the Mormon church.

The National Mothers' Congress ended its successful sessions on February 28, with an audience that tested the capacity of the Auditorium to its fullest extent. This organization was founded in 1896 by Mrs. Theodore W. Birney of Washington who has been its president since that time. The idea of bringing mothers together in a national united effort for a more enlightened parenthood is the basis of this society of noble women. "Orphan asylums are excellent institutions, reform schools fill a certain need and jails are a necessity," says Mrs. Birney, "but if we had educated mothers, or perhaps I should say, 'women educated to make competent, capable mothers,' the orphan asylums, reform schools and jails would want for inmates." The new president is Mrs. Frederick Schoff of Philadelphia. She is a womanly, capable and cultured mother, who was married at twenty and has not only reared a family of seven children from kindergarten to Harvard College, but also has done much work in improving the condition of childhood everywhere. One of the most prominent ladies in attendance at the congress was Mrs. Fred T. Dubois who is the wife of Senator Dubois of Idaho. She is greatly interested in caring and providing for motherless children, and the orphan asylums at the National capital and elsewhere find in Mrs. Dubois a worthy and valuable assistant.

member of this largely increasing organization one must be a descendant of a Revolutionary soldier. The recent session was the eleventh Continental Congress and was presided over by Mrs. Charles W. Fairbanks, wife of United States Senator Fairbanks of Indiana, who was again elected President-General of the Congress for the ensuing year. Among the vice-president-generals elected was Mrs. Althea Randolph Bedle, widow of ex-Governor Bedle of New Jersey, whose portrait appears as the initial cut to this article. Mrs. Bedle is one of the most distinguished society women in the country. Another prominent woman at the congress was Mrs. Charles H. Deere, of Moline, Ill., who was elected State Regent of the Illinois Daughters of the American Revolution at Washington. By the birthright of an ancestry which reverts to a Colonial governor on one side and to Revolutionary heroes on both sides of her family, she possesses a patriotic devotion akin to that which swayed the hearts of the yeomen of old. Taken all in all, the recent Continental Congress was a brilliant and commendable success.

Continental Congress was a brilliant and commendable success.

The annual convention of the Woman Suffrage Association was attended by a large number of delegates, chief among whom was Susan B. Anthony and Elizabeth Cady Stanton, both honorary presidents of the Association. These ladies have long advocated the right of suffrage for woman and their names are known throughout the civilized world. Besides these ladies there was in attendance Mrs. Elenora Babcock, of Dunkirk, N. Y., in charge of press work; the Rev. Antoinette Brown Blackwell, a pioneer suffragist; the Rev. Anna H. Shaw, vice-president at large; Mrs. Rachel Foster Avery, Dr. Cora Smith Eaton, Miss Alice Stone Blackwell, and many others of prominence in the movement. Committees of the Association appeared before Congressional committees and plead that women be allowed to exercise the right of suffrage.

various sessions. Mrs. Anna D. West of Massachusetts is to have charge of "Civics." Miss Ellen C. Sabin of Wisconsin, who holds a professor's chair in the Milwaukee-Downer College, will direct the session on education. The evening devoted to "Literature," which is usually a star session, is being arranged by Mrs. May Alden Ward of Cambridge, Mass. Mrs. Dimies T. S. Denison of New York, the vice-president, is to direct the "Civil Service" session, this subject being presented for the first time to the convention. For the press session Mrs. Ella W. Peattle of Chicago has been chosen; for the art session, Mrs. A. H. Brockway of Brooklyn, while Mrs. Florence Kelley of New York will preside over the industrial session. Some of the other subjects to be considered are clubhouses, travelling libraries, forestry and the Audubon movement. No less than three mornings have been set aside for business, and these will be in charge of Mrs. Lowe, the president. The question that may arouse more interest than all the others, if introduced at all, will be the color problem. The idea is advanced that the General Federation should not discuss the question, but should permit each state federation to settle the matter as it sees fit.

That these five great organizations of women above described, are doing much for home and humanity cannot be gainsaid. And that the

That these nive great organizations of women above described, are doing much for home and humanity cannot be gainsaid. And that the subordinate branches of these associations are likewise of benefit, incalculable benefit to their members is equally true. A good club woman is a good wife and a good mother. The influence of the women's club is in the direction of the intellectual and moral upbuilding of the family.

the intellectual and moral upbuilding of the family.

It has been lately said that the country had gone "Woman Club Mad" so many different organizations having come into existence all over the Union. It is true that Literary Clubs and in fact women's clubs of all kinds are being organized in nearly every section and where in some cases the mothers may neglect their home affrage.

The Humboldt glacier in Greenland is more than sixty miles in breadth, three hundred feet deep and of unknown length. All ice products are naturally found in their perfection in the Arctic regions. The grandest glacier region of the temporate zone is in the Himalaya mountains. One of these glaciers, that of Bepho, is thirty-six miles in length and covers hundreds of square miles in area. Read How You May Get this Splendid Japanese Gift for Your Own Home. The most gifted race in the world with the needle are the Orientals. For centuries the rich and varied designs worked by their hands have been the admiration and delight of lovers of art. A few years ago an American was fortunate enough to invent machinery that would reproduce these rich designs of embossed embroidery as needlework, even to the delicate films of gold-thread work. Still more curious the Japanese obtained plans and made similar machinery, that they have the addition of "chesp labor" to Yanke machinery. In this way the most delicate Armenian and Turkish needlework is imitated so closely that none but the expert, on close examination, reveals the minor point of imitation.

Veracious Records of the Doin's in the Cobb Corner Postoffice, "Writ out" by the Boy Behind the Counter.

In the May number of "Comfort" the "Cobb's Corner Congress" will continue sessions.]

HE Postmaster came stagger ing in from the woodshed with three snowy sticks of birch. The gang that was bugging the stove surveyed him blandly and disinterest-edly and made no move to get out of the way.

"H'ist up your hucks," he snorted and then without a snorted and then without a word of warning he dropped the big sticks clattering to the dented floor. All the loafers snapped away their legs as agile as lobsters in deep water. No, not all!
Uncle Wack Spofford was looking up the eclipses in a patent medicine almanac and didn't notice the impending avalanche. One of the sticks caught him right across the toes.

"Je-e-e-ere Cris'mus, Sancho Pedro!" he squealed dropping the almanac and grabbing his foot.
"Wal, git out the way, then!" grunted The Postmaster, opening the stove door and raking the coals forward.
"If I thought ye done that a puppus," yelled Uncle Wack, "I'd cuff your jackass ears up to a peak and then cuff the peak off."
"How long hev' ye held the heavyweight champeenship of the world?" The Postmaster asked tauntingly.
"Wal, I was allus able to wrassle you back-holts when we went to school," whined Uncle Wack, souffing his toes with his palm.

The Postmaster, squinting and squizzling his face as the heat from the open stove door flared against it, simply snorted in disgust. The others in the crowd wagged their jaws solemn-

"There hain't no satisfaction fighting with a pole-cat," growled Uncle Wack extending his foot and wriggling his toes to determine whether any had dropped off. "If I thought ye done that a puppus," he continued, "I'd never trade with ye another cent's wuth, tom ding me if I would."

"Wal, I might's well go and tell Square Shaw to draw up bankruptcy papers," The Postmaster retorted. Uncle Wack started up out of his chair. Just Uncle Wack started up out of his chair. Just for one instant the eyes of the gang opened. By the manner in which Uncle Wack clutched his cane some expected that he would hit The Postmaster a clip. But he simply limped away toward the door gasping over and over again, "Not another cent's wuth—not another cent's wuth, to save your pelt from perdition." He went out and banged the door.

"Wal ye hain't lost any canvas that will slack your headway a mite," said Cap'n Jote Bailey.

"He's too mean to fertilize pigweed," chipped in Teed Strout.

"D' I ever tell ye about the time we dug out the fox over on Tarheel Hill near Wack's place?" asked Ezry Pitts. "Wal' me'n Uncle Jud and one of his boys run a fox into a hole one day and we set to work to dig him out.

"I must say it's burnin' my innards quite noticeable,' says Jud, sloofin' up the drool in the corners of his mouth. He really looked distressful. I wasn't feelin' well myself.

"Here, boy,' says I. 'Jest ye sample this will ye, and see what it tastes like to you. P'raps Uncle Jud and I have kind o' blunted our tasters while we've been knockin' round in the world.'

"The boy took in a mouthful and then he rose up into the air and spit it out. He was standing on a snow drift eight feet high. That mouthful that he spit out bored a hole right straight down to the ground jest as if it had been chain lightnin'.

"Weraow-w-w!' yelled the boy rollin' around on the snow; 'it's pizen.'

"Wal, I don't p'tend to say it's pizen', says Uncle Jud, 'but it sartain hain't dyspepsy cure.' And he kep'on rubbing his palm around over his weskit.

"Blame the stuff,' says I. Then I grabbed the jug and tipped it all over that fox hole. It commenced to run out—go-lug, go-lu g, go-lug! In less than ten seconds—whoosh, up come that fox. His hair was mostly burnt off and he was the most astonished lookin' fox I ever see in all my life. He giv' me a reproachful stare as much as to say, 'You're a mighty skinny sport, you are!' Then he twisted 'round and whined and lapped at his tail. Ev'ry time his tongue touched his brush and of hair come off. The fox kept whinin' and lapping and in no time almost he had twisted round and whined and lapped at his tail. Ev'ry time his tongue touched his brush a wad of hair come off. The fox kept whinin' and lapping, and in no time, almost, he had lapped off ev'ry hair. There that tail stuck straight out like a nigger's sore finger. The fox looked at it melancholy-like for a minute and then he give me one more of those reproachful looks that said, 'I don't care to live in a world that's got sports in it like you!' Then he laid down there on the snow and died. Blame me, 'twas sad.

Then he laid down there on the snow and died. Blame me, 'twas sad.
"'Jud,' says I, 'we've got to hunt into this matter. I feel like as though there was a blacksmith shop set up inside of me.' So over to Wack's house we went as though Satan was chasin' us. We found the old sanup jest tallerin' his boots. He was a-comin' over to where we was diggin' out the fox. "'Look here, Wack,' says I, 'what in tunket did ye put in that jug? Our stummicks feel as though we had lit spring bonfires in 'em.'

"'Cider,' says Wack. 'Course it's cider,' says he, puttin' down his taller and lookin' at us, astonished-like. 'The boy seed me draw it out of the jug. Come to the sullerway and I'll show ye that it was jest cider.'

"So he lit a candle and we went along to the sullerway. Wack took the stopper out of a jug and smelt. Then he took the stopper out of another jug on the lower step and smelt of that.

"'Yas,' says he, 'did ye bring it back?' "'Some of it,' says I, rubbin' my stummick. 'I poured the rest down a fox hole, you blamed old hard-shelled turtle, you!' "'You understand,' says he, 'that lye is thutty cents a gallon. I was only chargin' ye twenty for the cider. I shall look to ye to make it right. I shall hav' to tax ye for the lye. The opening chapters of this intensely interesting story appeared in February Comfort. Back numbers may be obtained by enclosing three cents to Comfort, Augusta, Me., for each number desired.

During the past year portions of Indian Territory were opened to settlement by the Government allotment of lots by chance, and the scenes that were enacted in the years gone by, when Oklahoma was the objective point of settlers from east and west, north and south, were again presented in a much more exciting manner. A Kansas telephone girl luck is sequenced a lot valued at $17,000, and others were nearly as fortunate.

Because of the exciting events that have transpired in Oklahoma and Indian Territory, events that have attracted the attention of the whole country, the story of "Ned Todd" is presented to our readers in the hope that instruction and entertainment may be derived from its perusal.

CHAPTER VII.

SEPARATED.

In that hour of peril, Archie Holland's muscles were like steel. His hand which under ordinary excitement might have trembled, was now as steady as an iron bar.
"Where are you going?" they heard a voice "To the front room," another answered.

"Come on, we've got no time to fool away down here."

"If Cap Snell don't hurry up, he'll get away." "Who fired that shot?"

"I don't know. It was some blunderin'

"He's awake by this time. Two shots ought to warn any one. Come on up to the attic." "Hello, there is the trap door open." "Let it alone, we've got no time to fix it now."

It was evident that these two men knew nothing about the fair prisoner, whom Snell had confined in the dungeon, nor did they dream that Archie Holland had found her. As dream that Archie Holland had found her. As they went away, one of them said:

"Well, we've got the worst one fast."

"That evidently means that Todd is either dead or a captive," Archie Holland thought.

"Well, I must now prepare to fight it out alone and at the same time defend this unfortunate girl."

As the footsteps passed out of the upper room, Archie Holland said:

"Miss Miller if we would baffle our foes we must act at once. Come, let us get out of here."

"How will we?" she asked.

"There is a sort of a stairway leading above. I struck it several times in my fall."

He raised her to her feet, and she was so weak that she scarce could stand.

"Come now, let me help you."
"I am very weak—I cannot walk—" she began.

"Courage, courage, young lady."

"No, no, it is no use, kind sir. Go! fly for your life, save yourself, for I would only be a drag to hold you back."

"No, no, I cannot consent to that. We will both escape or perish together."

"It is folly for you to stay here with me, or attempt to escape with me. Fly! go while you can."

can."

"Young lady, I promised your dying father that I would find you and rescue you from these fiends, or die in the effort, and I intend to keep that solemn obligation."

"My father?"

"Yes, did I not tell you that I saw him die? They left him for dead, and we came upon the body before life was extinct. He died in my arms, and he begged me to find you and take you from Capt. Snell."

"Then you are not one of the Oklahoma ban-

"Then you are not one of the Oklahoma ban-

"Then you are not one of the Oklahoma banditti?"

No, I am like yourself a traveler in misfortune; but I will sooner die than violate the oath that I made to your father."

The young lady made another effort to walk and found her strength rapidly returning. They groped their way to the foot of the rickety stairs, and there the youth took the weak girl in his strong arms, and carried her to the apartment above. Here all was darkness.

The tramp of many feet in and about the house, the hurried whispering of voices could be heard. Something of an important and serious nature was evidently going on. Archie knew that it was the banditti assembling in the front room where he was supposed to be. At this moment the loud chuckling and giggling of the idiot could be heard.

"Shet up, Snap," some one growled, and the kick that momentarily silenced the idiot could be plainly heard from where they were.

"Miss Miller," Archie whispered, holding one of those little trembling hands in his own,

"Miss Miller," Archie whispered, holding one of those little trembling hands in his own, "you must be very brave now."
"I am—I am gaining my strength every moment," she answered.
"Follow me," he said, and he began groping his way about the room.
"Is there an outlet that leads to the open air?" she asked in a whisper.
"There certainly is, and yet I have been unable to find it."
The youth was growing his way about the work," he said.

Loud angry voices could be heard even from where they stood.
"Open this door, open it quick or we will batter it down," cried one more loud and fierce than the others.
"Maybe he's not in there," said some one.
"Yes, he is."
"I say him go in" put in the receally best

"Yes, he is."
"I saw him go in," put in the rascally host.
Archie gnashed his teeth, and wished that he had the hypocrite in his power.
"Open the door, open it quick or we will smash it down," commanded an imperious voice of one who was, beyond doubt, in command of the bandits.
"Oh doer what shall we do?" sobbed the "Oh dear, what shall we do?" sobbed the mand of the bandits.

"Oh dear, what shall we do?" sobbed the girl.

"We must get away as soon as possible for there will certainly be trouble if we do not."

"Crash, crash, crash," came heavy blows against the door above.

Archie was all the while busily engaged, trying to find the door, which in the darkness was no easy undertaking. At last his fingers ran against the window sash, and he seized it. It was made of iron same as the others, but when he tried to raise it, it yielded beneath his touch, and slid upward without any difficulty.

"Thank heaven!" he mentally ejaculated, "we at last have a means of escape."

The room in which they were was on the ground floor and it was but four or five feet from the window sill to the ground. He held the window up with one hand, while he passed his disengaged arm around the slender waist of Miss Miller, and raising her gently yet quickly passed her through the window. Although the moon shone, the window was so hemmed in by a shed and cluster of creeping vines all about the house, that the rays of the moon could not reach it.

It was like lowering the young lady into a pit of darkness.

"Do not fear, I will soon be with you," said Archie, as she hung over the window sill.

"I am not afraid, let me go!" she answered

He held his arm about her waist, and low-

He held his arm about her waist, and lowered her, until her toes touched the earth, and then released his hold.

"I am coming," he whispered.
At this moment the door to the attic room gave way with a crash, and a yell rose upon the air. It was only for a moment, however. An instant later, all was the deepest silence.

"He's not here," cried a voice, hoarse with rage and disappointment.

"Gone," cried another.

"Gone where?—where is he?"

"Aye, that we don't know."

"Aye, that we don't know."
"Bryce, Bryce, didn't you say he was in this room?" asked another.
"Yes, I'd swar I saw him come in here," answered a man whom he recognized as their "But he's gone."

Twas him that fired that shot," suggested another.

"Then he's in the house yet?"
"Of course, he can't git away. Come on, an' we'll have 'em both."
With a loud shout the banditti ran from the door clattering down the narrow, crooked stairway.

Archie Holland had not waited for this determination on the part of the bandits, but leaped nimbly through the window, alighting on the ground by the side of the frightened on the ground by the side of the frightened girl.

"Come," he whispered, placing his arm about her waist to support her faltering footsteps.

"We will yet escape them."

They hurried along under a sort of a shed and entered the door of an out-house, which was but a few feet away from the main building. The confusion and noise in the main building had increased to an uproar.

The out-building proved to be a sort of a general storage room. There were a few barrels, boxes and general rubbish in it. From a narrow aperture on the side opposite the main house the faint rays of the moon streamed in, giving a tolerable light.

"Wait here until I take a look around us," said Archie to his fair companion.

"I will," she answered sweetly and patiently. The full light of the moon fell on her features and he now discovered that she was very pretty. Her eyes and hair were black, and her features are grapher complexing clear and very pretty. Her eyes and hair were black, and her features regular, complexion clear, and form symmetrical. When Daisy Miller discovered that her rescuer, whom she had not been able before to see, was young and hand-some, she blushed. But rescuer and rescued had not time to give each other a moment's thought.

Every second was more precious to them than millions in gold. Archie wheeled to the narrow aperture but the next moment started back. Within four or five feet of it stood a tall, powerful brigand, holding a rifle in his

What was he to do? That sentry must be What was he to do? That sentry must be gotten rid of before their way was clear. Perhaps there was some other opening through which they might escape. The shed building in which they were hiding was sufficiently open for the moon's rays to shine through and partially light the interior. He discovered a door opening to another apartment, and without knowing whence it opened, he conducted his fair companion into it.

"Step carefully, so as not to make any noise,"

"Step carefully, so as not to make any noise," he whispered to her.
"I will."

"Twill."
"Do you know anything about the country about here?" he asked.
"Nothing."
"Here is a door anyway," he said as the moon's rays revealed cracks about a door. Carefully raising the latch he noiselessly opened it, holding a pistol ready for any emergency. A man was sitting with his back toward the

A man was sitting with his back toward the door. The slight noise they were compelled to make, caused him to start, but before he could realize what was about to happen, the butt of Archie Holland's pistol descended upon his head with such crushing force that he fell senseless to the earth.

So slight was the noise, and so busily were the outlaws within engaged that they did not hear the blow which felled one of their comrades.

Without a moment's delay Archie seized Miss Miller in his arms and bore her from the house to the wood. He had gone but a few rods when he paused beneath a giant oak to rest and listen

"Miss Miller," he said, "I have a companion and friend somewhere near here, whose services would be invaluable to us if we could find him?

'Find him and bring him here by all means," interrupted the brave girl.

"But you, will I dare leave you alone?"
"Yes, sir, I will have no fears at being left alone."

"I think you had better stay here. By the way, the branches of this tree come quite low to the ground, can you not be concealed among them?"

He assisted her to mount among the thickest of the limbs, and then bidding her remain until he should come for her, he went down the forest path.

On the right the small bushes and tall grass formed a complete jungle. We can hardly say that Archie's plans were fully matured. He knew that unless the pistol shot he had heard had killed the border detective he was in all probability alive, but a prisoner. If he was a prisoner and Archie could succeed in rescuing him, he felt sure that they would be able to make their way to the Boomers' camp, where they would be safe. Then he would resume his search for his father.

search for his father.

He paused as the sound of footsteps coming up the path fell on his ears. To avoid meeting the person coming up the path he withdrew to the thicket and sank to the ground.

"It's no use of staying there," one of the approaching men was saying. "One's enough to watch him now that he's tied. We must be looking after the other feller."

They went hurriedly up the hill and he could not hear anything more they said.

An angry yell rose from the house, at the discovery that he had escaped. The yell was answered by a shout from the men who had just passed the concealed youth, and were now between him and the oak tree, where he had left Daisy. Archie realized that she was in danger of recapture, but he knew from what he had heard that the ranger was a captive somewhere, and that he could best serve the beautiful young lady by securing his liberty and assistance. assistance.

CHAPTER VIII.

The perils of the day sank into insignificance when compared with the night.

When Todd heard that command and found When Todd heard that command and found himself seized and the pistol muzzle thrust against his temple, he did not despair. For a single moment he seemed to yield to his would-be captors; but, just as the fingers clutching his shoulders began to relax their grip, he performed a most wonderful backward somersault, the toe of his heavy boot striking the arm that held the pistol.

There was a blinding flash, a stunning report, and the bullet whistled harmlessly through the air.

"Hold on!" roared one of the two men who had seized him from behind. "Don't let him break away."

"Hold on!" roared one of the two men who had seized him from behind. "Don't let him break away."

But they knew not what a giant they had to contend with. Todd was on his feet in a moment, and with his left hand, which he had managed to free, struck one of the ruffisms a blow which laid him sprawling on his back. He had his revolver in his right hand, and could he have got that free also, he would undoubtedly have made it disastrous for the three men who had pounced upon him; but the man who had seized his right arm was a powerful fellow, who realized that his life depended on his holding the pistol like grim death.

The Major struck him once on the side of the head, staggering him, and would have come out best in the struggle, had not the man who had fired the shot recovered from the effects of the kick and knocked the detective senseless with the butt of his pistol.

"There, Jack, you hev done it," said the man who had been struggling with the pistol, stooping over the fallen man and feeling of his head to see if the skull was broken.

"Don't believe it. Ye'd better be a looking."

"All right, Sam, hev ye a cord?"

"No, but Tom has some buckskin thongs."

"Where is Tom?"

"Here," growled the man who had been knocked down, starting to his feet, rubbing his bruised and bleeding face.

"What's the matter, 'Tom?"

"Dun no, think it must have been a comet struck me. Saw more'n forty thousand stars," answered Tom.

"Oh, the Cap'n go to thunder. He ain't been knocked down like I hev."
"Give me the thongs and shet up," said Sam. Tom, grumbling some unintelligible threats floundered among his numerous pockets and at last drew out a handful of deer skin thongs.
"Thar they are," he said.
"Come, Jack, and help tie him."
"I believe he broke my arm with that kick," said Jack.

"Come both o' ye and help me tie him, quick," said Sam, for he had at this moment discovered that the unconscious man had begun

"I'd ruther cut his throat," growled Tom. But they aided Sam and soon had Ned Todd tied hard and fast. When he was secured they began to breathe easier. "Now if Cap was only here we'd be all right," said Sam, sitting on the ground by the side of the captive. "Where is he?" asked Tom.

Sam glared in exultation at the prostrate man before him. All the border desperadoes and outlaws had good reason to dread Ned Todd. He had brought more road agents to justice than any other man, and was heartily despised by all. The three scoundrels knew that this act of theirs would give them quite a local reputation among their comrades on the border.

tation among their comrades on the border.

The detective made no response to their taunts and jeers.

Nearly an hour had elapsed since his capture, when the report of a pistol was heard in the direction of the house, and a terrible confusion ensued. Men could be heard running about the house. the house.

the house.

"Thar, they've got the other 'n," said Tom.

"No, they hain't," returned Jack, seriously.

"I bet he's got away."

"Let's go up and see."

"No, we mustn't leave this feller."

"Why, he's tied so he can't budge an inch," said the impetuous Tom.

"But he might," responded the cautious Sam.

"He's the wust of the two, and if we let him git away—"

"He's the wust of the two, and if we let him git away..."
"He'll not git away. By Jiminy, thar's a fight up thar, an' I'm goin' t' hev a hand in it," cried Tom.
"So'm I," put in Jack. "Sam's enough t' guard a feller what is tied."
"You'd better stay here, boys," said Sam, somewhat alarmed.

"No, no, we're goin'; one's enough to watch him. Ef ye can't do it, blow his brains out an' come on." They hurried away up the narrow path, and Sam clutched his revolver in his hand and glared furiously at the prisoner on the ground before him. "Yve a notion to take his advice" he hissed through his teeth. "I've jist a notion to put the pistol to yer head and blow yer brains out. What ye got to say about it?"

"Nothing," Major Todd answered.
"Ye ain't?"

"No, it would be useless to say anything. I

"No, it would be useless to say anything. I am powerless to prevent you."
The scoundrel had raised his pistol, evidently to carry out his threat, when a loud yell rose on the air. What did it mean? The guard rose to his feet, standing over the detective listening to the noise on the hill above him and giving little attention to the prisoner. He really needed no attention, for never was a man more harpless.

needed no attention, for never was a man more helpless.

"I guess thar's a rumpus over thar," said the guard, turning back the broad brim of his hat and trying to pierce the darkness with his eyes.

So intently was he engaged that he did not hear the slight rustling of bushes in his rear. The detective heard the noise and began to take hope. Suddenly he heard a footstep. The guard heard it, too, and turned—but too late.

Whack! came a blow upon his head and he staggered and fell. Another blow rendered him unconscious.

him unconscious.

Of course the newcomer was none other than Archie Holland.

"Are you hurt?" he asked, going to where the detective lay.

"No."

"Are you tied?"

"Yes."
"Well, I will soon have you loose," said Archie, whipping out his knife and cutting the bonds which bound the detective.
"Now look to that fellow; he may revive sufficiently to get away," said Todd, rubbing his wrists which had suffered severely from the tight thongs.

Archie went to the side of the fallen outlaw,

Archie went to the side of the fallen outlaw.

Archie went to the side of the fallen outlaw, who had just begun to revive.

"I'm glad I did not kill him," he said, "because I want bloodshed to be my last resort; but now that he is not dead what on earth are we to do with him?"

"Handcuff and gag him."

"Have you any irons with you?"

"Yes, here's a pair in my coat pocket. I usually carry a pair about me. Put these on him and we can tie his feet with some of these deer skin thongs."

Before Sam had time to recover, he was securely bound. Todd then suggested that he be taken farther back into the wood.

"We may have the rascals all about in no

"We may have the rascals all about in no time," he argued.
"Yes, Major, and there is another person besides ourselves to look after," said the youth.
"Who?"

"Miss Daisy Miller, the daughter of the man who was killed by Captain Snell. The young lady who was captured by the Oklahoma banditti." He then proceeded to give the detective brief account of his adventures since they had separated, indicating the strange manner in which he had discovered Miss Miller.

which he had discovered Miss Miller.

"This has been a night of miraculous adventures," said Todd.

"Yes, and they are not over yet."

"No, listen; they are scattering. We must get away from here."

"Where will we go?"

"Get this prisoner out of the way," said the detective. Major Todd seized the bandit, who had now almost recovered consciousness, "Don't dare give utterance to a single cry or I

"Spare me, Oh, Ned Todd, spare me," the wretch groaned.

"I am glad that you are aware who I am. If you know me you will understand that I am not to be triffed with."

"I know that," was the answer in a pitiful, whining tone.

"Then keep your mouth closed."

"Then keep your mouth closed."
They crept back to the thicket, dragging their captive with them. Todd had been careful to possess himself of the rascal's pistol and

They are searching the woods for me," said

Archie, with some anxiety.

The shouts and sounds of voices had grown less distinct, but the cracking of twigs indicated that the Oklahoma outlaws were in the

"We can very easily get away from here," said the detective.
"But Miss Miller is sitting among the branches of that great, old oak tree; we must not leave her behind," Archie answered.

A cloud came over Ned Todd's face, but he action came over Ned Todd's face, but he made no answer. As they were groping their way through the dark jungle, they suddenly came upon a small shed-like house, about ten feet square. It was made of rough hewn boards not very strong. For years it had evidently been neglected for the grass and weeds had grown up about it so thick that they almost concealed it.

Creeping vines, wild ivy and hazel were growing all about it, so that they were almost against the house before they had seen it.

"This is a good place to halt and watch their movements," said the detective.
"Yes, but we must find Miss Miller."

Loud voices could be heard not fifty paces away. "They are about the very tree in which she is hiding," said Archie. "Heaven grant they may not find her."

CHAPTER IX.

THE PRISONER'S ESCAPE.

Angry, excited men could be heard tramping through the woods. Oaths and imprecations could be heard filling the air, and at times almost swelling to a sullen roar.

"I wish we had her here," the youth whis-

Todd had been silent until now. He knew the locality in which the robbers were must necessarily bring them near the young lady's place of concealment.

"I think one of us had better stay here," he said, after a few moments' reflection, "and the other go to the tree and bring her here to us. We have got to do some fine work just now, or we will lose our heads yet."

"I will go."

"I will go."

"I believe you had better stay here and guard the prisoner. My experience in wood craft may enable me to do more than you can."

But Archie was anxious to go himself. He thought that Miss Miller would be more apt to recognize in him a friend, than in a man whom she had never seen. After some precious minutes lost in argument, Todd said:

"Well, then, since you insist on it, you can go. I will stay and keep guard over this fellow. A great deal depends on keeping him safe."

Archie waited for no second instruction, but Archie waited for no second instruction, but started off through the woods.

"Come on, come on," cried a voice not over thirty paces away. "Let's go whar the other is. We'll be sure o' one o' em yit."
Archie Holland fell to the ground and lay as still as if he were dead.

Archie Holland fell to the ground and lay as still as if he were dead.

"That voice, that voice," he thought. "I have heard it before, but where? It is like some long forgotten dream, it is familiar to me, and yet it brings an unpleasantness with it."

"All right, Cap, we are comin", responded half a dozen other voices.

There were some commands in a tone so low that our young friend could not catch, them

"Now is my time," thought the youth, and he rose and crept through the jungle, parting he rose and crept through the jungle, parting the bushes with his hand so carefully that he made scarcely any noise.

The oak tree was soon in sight, and he made his way as carefully and with as much speed as possible toward it.

"Is she there? has she been discovered and is the almost dead with fright?" he was asking she almost dead with fright?" he was asking himself, and trembling with apprehension, despite all his good resolutions to the contrary. He is now beneath the tree, his eye trying to pierce the gloom and get a glimpse of the fair fingitive.

Before he knew it he was almost face to face with a man. A cocked revolver was at his head, and a deep voice in a low chuckle, said:

"I've got ye now!"
"Hold on, who are you?" demanded the youth.

"He, he, he, I know who you are, and this settles it."
"Snap!" went the pistol.

"Snap!" went the pistol.

Archie Holland could scarcely realize that his life had been saved only by the pistol missing fire. He acted on the impulse of the moment, and so suddenly that he astonished himself. At a bound he was on the man and struck him one well directed blow which made him stagger. He recovered immediately, however, and closed with the youth. In that dark and silent old wood there then commenced a death struggle. Neither spoke nor made any outcry. Luck was again on the side of the youth. His antagonist stumbled and fell heavily, his head striking a stone with such force as to stun him. Archie stooped over the prostrate form and gave him a whack with the buttend of his pistol to assure himself that he trate form and gave him a whack with the butter that he trate form and gave him a whack with the butter of this pistol to assure himself that he would be bothered no more by him, and hastened to the tree.

"Miss Miller, Miss Miller," he whispered.
"Yes, sir," came the voice, faint, yet distinct, from the branches of the stout old oak.
"Hasten down quick."

The girl made but slight noise as she descended, and the youth kept a sharp look-out for their enemy.
"Here I am," she said, and turning round he saw the beautiful girl standing at his side. The pale moonlight made her white face radiant and her black eyes were in strong relief against her clear complexion.
"We must go," he whispered. "My friend is now waiting for us in this jungle."
"Sam, Sam, Sam, where are you?" a voice was calling at the foot of the hill.
"Here, quick, come on, they have discovered the escape of Major Todd, and we must go to him as rapidly as we can."

Drawing her small, trembling hand through his arm, he started through the thicket. Thorn bushes tore their clothes, and switches flew back stricking them in the face, and in some places the jungle seemed almost impenetrable. some places the jungle seemed almost impenetrable.

To add to their general discomfiture, the voices of their pursuers could be heard at times too near to be comfortable.

"They are somewhere in the woods or thicket," cried one voice, not over fifty yards

Archie paused and held the fair, trembling girl at his side, determined to defend her with his life.

"Do not be frightened, Miss Miller," he said. "I shall defend you. They shall not harm you." She trembled, yet a strange thrill of pleasure passed over her frame. She realized what a noble escort she had. Won't they search the woods?" she said.

"Yes, and we must join Major Todd and eave here."

leave here."

"Is he alone, why did he not come with you?"

"I left him guarding a prisoner."

"A prisoner?"

"Yes, we captured a bandit, and are now encumbered with a prisoner. But here we are," he concluded, as they suddenly came upon the vine covered wall of the strange out building.

"Archie," whispered a voice from the darkness.

"It is I. Is all right?" "Yes, you succeeded?"
"I did."

"They are all round us now." "I know it; listen, they are beating up the bushes."

The sound of tramping feet could be heard.

The detective and his young companion stood with pistol in hand, ready for conflict. "Hadn't we better make a fight here?" asked the youth.

"Not if we can help it. If the worst comes to the worst we will fight, but not as long as it can be avoided."

"Where is the prisoner?"

"In that old house."

"Had we not better bring him out?"

"Had we not better bring him out?" "No, he is bound and gagged, so that there is no doubt but that he will be quiet. He understands that he's to be shot if he makes

The youth crept to the opening and looked in. Dark as it was, he could make out the form of the prisoner sitting upon the floor. All sounds in the woods seemed to cease, and Archie, creeping back to where his companion was asked: was, asked:

Are they all gone?" "Are they all gone?"
"No, not by a good deal. They are nearer than they seem."
"There, I heard a footstep."
"Where?"

"On the other side of the house."
Suspicious sounds were heard by both. They were very much like the faint creak of rusty hinges, and both sprang to the window of the old house just in time to see the prisoner jerked through an open door on the opposite side.

"Ha, ha, ha!" rang out a wild, hoarse laugh on the other side.

"He's gone, Major," cried Archie.
"Shoot him."
"It's too late."

No month of all the year has been given so much attention by poets and writers as the month of April. Over and over the "low hung clouds" the April day of smiles and tears has been described and praised. It is the swift transition from sunshine to rain that seems to have endeared the fickle month to those gifted with imagination. Change seems to be synonymous with charm to those who are observers of the fickle month. "If you were April's lady" was evidently intended to point to a resemblance between the months and fair femininity -all smiles and tears.

We are showing our warm admiration for Germany. This might be done as effectually if we really approached the Emperor in a spirit of the county officers, and therefore the readers fair minded inquiry. Germany as well as some other nations has a system of old age pensions that show an advanced plane of thought. Our millionaires give with unlimited hand to colleges and kindred institutions-few give to make the closing years of life more pleasant to those who are not subjects for the almshouse. Homes for the aged when the payment of a small sum will secure good care are few. Mr. Carnegie has given a large sum for the establishment of old age pensions among his employees. Some railroads have a similar provision. The idea is one that should appeal to charitable givers. No memorial to a loved father or mother could be more lasting than aid to the humble aged and poor.

One of the most interesting incidents of Prince Henry's visit was the fact that on his way over he had gone into the steerage of the Kronprinz Wilhelm and asked the steerage passengers why they were leaving Germany. A fair sized crowd from Germany lands at New York with every incoming steamer. As the Prince journeyed through our land he must have felt surprise at the thousands and thousands of Germans who are now citizens of the Republic. It may be food for thought to this scion of royalty to ask "Why?" One irreverent newspaper suggested that it was in order to avail themselves of the democratic privilege of the plain citizen of New York who called from a mud scow to the imperial yacht "Hello, Hen!" It may be precisely for that reason for back of the lack of breeding and the coarseness of the greeting was a real spirit of sturdy independence. In reality, they might have answered the query as to their change of home by saying as one writer has that America spells opportunity.

Statistics show the surprising fact that New York is the fourth city of the United States in the size of its colored population. Washington, Baltimore and New Orleans are ahead of New York but with those exceptions. New York leads every southern city. A remarkably small per cent. of the number belong to the dependent or criminal class. There is some light in these figures upon the solving of the "negro problem." It has been claimed that the future of the colored race lay in their adopting an agricultural life. They must be able to force success through other means of industry as these alone can furnish employment in a great city. They also seem able to combat successfully adverse climatic conditions for New York is not tropical in its climate. The negro in the professions will probably have to look for support to his own people unless he demonstrates a rare ability that lifts him beyond the reach of average competition. The field of domestic service is open for all with a demand that always exceeds the supply. New York has the during the next few months, those of our

CHAPTER I.

"But Where is the Body?"

N the 24th of June, 1898, Mansfield viland bewildered by and sensational affair in its history—a case that became ere its untangling-one of the great criminal mysteries of the nation, even though it occurred in an obscure village in Maine.

I refer to the "Squire Brett Disappearance," or the Purinton mill mystery.

Thus on the 24th day of June, 1898, Squire Caleb Brett, 85 years old, leading business man of his county, ex-state senator, richest resident in the town of Mansfield, disappeared in broad noon from among his life-long friends, leaving for clues only snips from his garments and his well-known beaver hat.

The narrative carefully follows the developments of the affair and the reader is therefore left month by month in the same puzzled frame of mind as that which prevailed in Mansfield during the unraveling of the case.

The story gives vivid pictures of life in a typical New England village during a period of excitement and the characters are clear cut. As a matter of fact, the story is in a measure based on actual happenings and most of the characters are drawn from life. Though the detective element is introduced in the tale there are none of the unreal effects of melodrama but the movement of events travels connectedly and naturally. All the evidence in the affair will be set down for the perusal of the reader just as it came before the detectives and may exercise detective talents on his or her own account. Those who follow the story should take this evidence and study it, even as

The intense interest manifested in all parts of the nation over the many Colonial Novels, such as Richard Carvel, Janice Merideth, To Have and to Hold, etc., issued during the past year or two has aroused a feeling of high regard for the exciting adventures of the Revolutionary times. In the May number we shall begin a very strong story of love and adventure, "The Daughter of a Whig," having to do with events of the good old Colonial days. Etta W. Pierce, who died not long since, was a most dramatic writer of stories, bearing on events happening about old Boston, dating back over a hundred years ago, and we know our readers will be more than pleased with this particular story. I ask for no money. Simply write me a postal and I will send you an order on your nearest druggist for six bottles of Dr. Shoop's Rheumatic Cure, for every druggist keeps it. Use it for a month, and if it does what I claim pay your druggist $5.50 for it. If it doesn't, I will pay him myself.

I have no samples. Any medicine that can affect Rheumatism with but a few doses must be drugged to the verge of danger. I use no such drugs. It is folly to take them. You must get the disease out of the blood.

My remedy does that, even in the most difficult, obstinate cases. No matter how impossible this seems to you. I know it and I take this risk. I have cured tens of thousands of cases in this way, and my records show that 39 out of 40 who get those six bottles pay, and gladly. I have learned that people in general are honest with a physician who cures them. That is all I ask. If I fail I don't expect a penny from you.

Simply write me a postal card or letter. Let me send you an order for the medicine; also a book. Take it for a month, for it won't harm you anyway. If it cures pay $5.50. I leave that entirely to you. Address Dr. Shoop, Box 304, Racine, Wis.

Mild cases, not chronic, are often cured by one or two bottles. At all druggists.

REQUEST from one REQUEST from one of our Western readers for the exact recipes for Boston brown bread and baked beans is very gladly complied with herewith, and we also illustrate the historic bean pot, which is so familiar in all New England households.

morning drain, cover with fresh water, heat slowly, keeping below the boiling point until the skins burst. Drain beans, throwing the water out of doors, and not in the sink. Scald rind of one-half pound salt fat pork, scrape, remove one-fourth inch slice and place in bottom of pot. Cut through the rind of remaining pork every half inch, making cuts an inch deep. Put the beans in pot and bury the pork in the beans, leaving only the rind exposed. Mix together one tablespoon salt, two tablespoons molasses and three of sugar; add one cup boiling water, and pour this mixture over the beans. Then add enough more boiling water to cover the beans. Put cover on bean pot, put in oven and bake slowly six or eight hours, taking off the cover the last hour of cooking that the pork rind may become brown and crisp. Add water as needed, usually necessary as often as once an hour, and be sure the water is boiling. Add no water after cover has been removed. If yellow-eyed beans are used they should be boiled longer before putting into the pot, than the pea beans, as they need more cooking to make them soft. If one hasn't a regular earthen bean pot, a five pound lard pail can be substituted with good results.

BOSTON BROWN BREAD.

Mould should be filled only two-thirds full. The regular mould, having a hole in the center, is the best kind to use if a large loaf is to be steamed, as it is then sure to be well done all through. One-pound baking powder boxes make attractive little loaves, and are easy to slice, and the slices are more delicate because so much smaller than those from a large loaf.

For steaming, put the mould on a wire rack in bottom of kettle, fill kettle half full of boiling water, and add boiling water as needed. Be sure the cover of mould is tied down, to avoid a possibility of steam getting in.

avoid a possibility of steam getting in.

With the usual Saturday night meal of beans and brown bread, a pie of some sort ordinarily forms the desert, with a cup of good Oolong tea. A famous pie in the farming districts of New England is the dried apple pie with one crust. Nowadays almost everyone uses evaporated apple, if the fresh fruit has given out, and these may be used in place of the old time dried apple for a Tart Pie. They should be soaked over night in cold water. Then place them in a small earthen baking dish and add a little hot water. Cover

BROWN BREAD.

Be dark red in color. Brown sugar should be used instead of white, to retain the dark color. Cool, spread apples on the bottom crust, and then place narrow strips of paste across the top of the apple, from side to side, to form a lattice work on the top. They should be about half an inch wide, and an inch apart. Apricot filling may be used in this way in place of the apple. Dried apricos can be bought everywhere, and by soaking them over night and boiling until soft, with enough sugar to take off the acid flavor, a very rich filling is made.

Cole slaw, or pickled cabbage, makes a good relish for this supper, and if one has red cabbage, the effect is a little more striking. For this shred finely one-half head of cabbage, let stand in salt water for two or three hours, allowing two tablespoons salt to one quart cold water. Drain and cover with one half cup each of cold water and vinegar, cooked with six cloves, and one-fourth teaspoon mustard seed and strained. #### $3,000 for one Lemon Pie.

T is not often that a woman gets $3,000 for one lemon pie, but that kind of luck came to Mrs. J. E. Kane of New York City, not long ago. Mrs. Kane's husband is a telegraph operator in one of the broker's offices that are in the Wald or f Astoria hotel, where more millionaires may be found than under any other one of the world. Many of these millionaires may be found than under any other one of the world. Many of these millionaires may be found than under any other one of the world. Many of these millionaires may be found than under any other one of the stock in the wald of a wald or f wasn't good enough for him. He said he liked his wife's cooking better, and when he picked up a piece of lemon pie, that looked very tempting, one of the rich men asked him to l-t him try for himself what kind of a cook Mrs. Kane was. Mr. Kane was willing enough, and after the rich man had tried the pie, he liked it so much that he asked if Mrs. Kane couldn't send them down a whole one next day. Mr. Kane thought so, and the next day at lunch he had a big pie on hand about fifteen inches across and enough to go around the little crowd of millionaires at their lunch table. The pie was so much better than anything they had had since their mothers' pies, that they agreed to put a hundred shares of Northern Pacific stock aside for Mrs. Kane and let her have whatever it would bring. It was put in the name of "A. G. Pymacher," which meant "A Good Pie-maker," and the next day the sensational rush in Northern Pacific began. The prices kept going up, and Mr. Kane began to get nervous because he was afraid they would hold on too long, and he would not get more than the usual price for a pie. The brokers talked it over and finally Mr. Kane said he would toss a copper to see whether to sell or hold on. To sell won, and the stock was soid netting Mrs. Kane began to get nervous because he was afraid they would hold on too long, and he would not get more than the usual price for a pie. The brokers talked it over and finally Mr. Kane said he would

If any lady reader of Comfort wants to know how to make this famous $3,000 lemon pie, we give the recipe in full, but we cannot guarantee that she will get $3,000 for the result of her labors—but she will get a good lemon pie, which to a starving person would be worth more than $3,000.

Pottery for Roasts, Stews, Baking or Boiling.

You can get the natural flavor of your food. These vessels, the most desirable and invaluable for every-day use ever made, having corrugated sides and ventilated bottom they heat readily and do not scorch or burn contents. Our fire-proof clay crockspots and bakers will stand and retain more heat than any other cooking vessels ever invented. Only after years of experimenting and improvements were they finally perfected so they now not only save you money on eatables and drinkables but save many dollars in fuel and time, giving you perfect uniformly health cooked food of all kinds. They are indestructible.

NO BURNED BOTTOMS. NO TASTE OF TIN.

BOSTON BEAN POT AND CEREAL COOKER. Our smaller covered handled pot, as above illustrated, is a correct model of the genuine Boston Best Baker. If your family is fond of the dish, you should have one of them; as with nothing else can you get the same results, tender and rich in flavor, is the way some one puts it. You can cook more than you will need for a single meal, warm overoften and always have the very best warm baked beans.

Rice. It is also desirable as a Rice Cooker, in fact, people who eat a great deal of rice and other cereals, buy almost as many for that purpose, as are bought as Beas Bakers. Does away with the double boller for cooking cereal.

COFFEE ROILER. Quality and Purity. Owing to its being seamless and flint lined, it is the only Boiler on the market that can be thoroughly cleansed, site having once been used, thus insuring the quality and purity of your coffee.

Always Hot. After having absorbed the heat necessary to boil the coffee irrains it for a great length of time, so that you can have hot (not warm) coffee, without keeping it on a hot stove, until it is spoiled, as so many have to do.

COMBINATION COVERED ROANTER, BAKER AND STEW PAN. The Ladies' Friend. The largest covered dish in our Combination Culinary Wonder. It will roast, bake or stew equally well. They are 11 inches diameter, 5 inches high and hold about 11-2 gallons.

The superior advantages of this roaster are: The Meat requires no water or basing. Cooks uniformly throughout. Betains the juice and flavor of the meat and requires no attention. Boasts quicker than any other Boaster made. Browns beautifully, and does not tain or burn. Meat should not be seasoned until half cooked.

Ordinarily to get a nice cut it is necessary to buy a large roast; with this Boaster till, 2 or 3 pounds can be as nicely roasted as 10 or 15 pound cut. Every 4-pound roast will absolutely shrink 16 or 18 ounces if roasted in cast stoves.

If at any time you are using oven for baking you can roast meat on top of siove. It is fine for cooking fruit or canning, making jelly, tomato catsup and preserves, cooking oatmeal, corn meal mush and all kinds of puddings, escalloped oysters, potatoes, white and brown bread and fruit cake, suct puddings and apple dumplings. In act, it can be used for every conceivable purpose.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY H. EDWARD SWIFT.

HE primary cause of all the effects which we are about to consider is found in a force known as Electricity, from the Greek name of amber (election), this being the body in which electric influences were first. influences were first observed. The peo-ple of two thousand or more years a go were acquainted with a few facts, such as the attractive power of amber after being rubbed; the benumb-

ing shocks of the torpedo, a kind of electric fish; the aurora borealis; the lightning flash; and the sparks or streams of light which, under certain circumstances, are seen to flash from the human body. Six hundred years before Christ, Thales a Grecian philosopher, observed the former of these facts, but it was nearly twenty centuries before it was suspected that any connection existed between these phenomena.

At the present stages of our information on this subject it would appear that electricity is a mode of motion in the particles of bodies very similar to heat and light. Like sound these are known to be dependent on undulatory motion; but whilst sound is brought out by the vibration of a body, as a whole electricity appears to depend upon some motion of the atoms themselves.

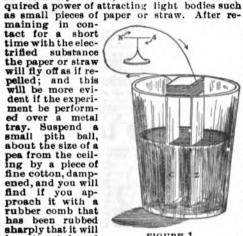

selves.

Be this as it may, it is certain that anything that tends to set up motion of the atoms in bodies, will also tend to call forth a display of electric force in one form or another. There are several ways of obtaining electrical results, for instance: mechanical, chemical, and through changes of temperature. Most mechanical action that produces friction or percussion, produces electricity. Every chemical action is accompanied by electrical effects. Changes of temperature, especially if sudden, call forth a display which we are all familiar with—lightning.

If we rub any resinous substance such as amber, resin, sealing-wax or ebonite, with a piece of warm dry flannel, we will find it has ac-quired a power of attracting light bodies such has been rubbed sharply that it will be attracted and never repelled; but if you substitute a silk thread for the cotton, the pith ball will first be attracted and then repelled. The damp cotton allows the electricity to escape, hence is a conductor, while the silk thread will not allow the electricity and is called a non-conductor. All bodies are either one or the other. All metals are good conductors, silver standing at the head of the line, with copper, the metal is extensively used, as second. Dry air is the best insulator, or the poorest conductor. Glass and ebonite are also very poor conductors, and are extensively used as insulators.

Electricity is generated by the action of acids or their salts on metals. The metal more acted upon by the acid or salt becoming the negative as can be shown by the following experiment. Two strips, one of copper and the other of zinc one inch by four inches, have a piece of copper wire soldered to each. Take a small flat piece of cork or dry wood an inch square by say three-quarters of an inch thick, and place it between the plates as shown in Fig. 1, and lash them together with a piece of waxed string. Be careful that the plates do not touch at any point. If we immerse this arrangement (which is a simple galvanic couple) in a tumbler of a solution consisting of one part sulphuric acid and three parts water, we shall be able to get a weak current of electricity. If a delicately poised magnetic needle be allowed to come to rest in its natural position, i.e., pointing north and south, and the wires connected with the strips be twisted together so as to be parallel to and over the needle, as shown in Fig. 1, the needle will be deflected out of its nominal position and out of line with the wire. If the needle be again allowed to come to rest, north and south, the battery having been removed.

to rest, north and south, the battery having been remov-ed, and then the tumbler be held close over the needle as held close over the needle as in Fig. 2, so the needle points from the copper to the zinc strip, the needle will be again deflected out of its position, but in this case in the opposite direction. It is a well-known fact that if a wire or any other conductor, along which the ductor, along which the electric current is passing be brought over and parallel to a suspended needle after to a suspended needle after being magnified, pointing north and south, the needle is immediately deflected from this north and south position and assumes a new position more or less east and west according to the quantity of current passing, and the nearness of the conductor to the needle. We will also find that the direction the needle swings depends also on the direction the current is passing. This is stated in Ampere's law which is briefly as follows:

"If a current be caused to flow over and parallel to a freely suspended needle previously pointing north and south, the north pole of Certain diseases kill their victims by gradually robbing them of bodily material—a manner of death slow, yet terrifying, and usually fraught with mental if not physical suffering.

Consumption actually consumes; it is a well named plague.

Four requirements must be met to cure consumption and other wasting ills, and Four also to prevent their attack. They are: First, to combat and forestall germs; Second, to nourish the body; Third, to tone and fortify the nerve power of resistance to disease, and Fourth, to meet the demands for local treatment.

THE FOUR FREE REMEDIES

To combat and destroy germs, to nourish the loody, to fortify the system and to soothe and heal broken and inflamed tissues, in accord with the necessities in particular cases, and to thus cure and prevent consumption and all vitality-draining ills of persistent, chronic nature, the above wonderful, Free combination is unmistakably unmatched. Minnie Morang jest vummed that she
If spunk could fetch it, was bound to be An opery singer of high renown
And bring some credit to our old town.
And at it she hammered good and stout,
She squealed and hollered like all git-out;
She said that the big guns all agreed
'Twas about like workin' a hoss for speed,
—This trainin' a voice to make it stout,
And so she practiced like all "git out."
For she tooted it up, hurroo, hooray!
She squealed and squalled blame nigh all day.
She claimed that she done it to fill her tones,
But 'cordin' to notions of old Bill Jones
It wasn't a voice that ye'd want to fill;
"I sh'd have the darned thing pulled," said Bill.
But, ginger of Goshen, Min Morang
Jest minded nothin' but sang and sang.
She never attempted to sing a tune
But morn and ev'nin', night or noon,
She practiced her scale and run and trill
With squeals like the rip-saw in Hobson's mill.
So time slipped on till her Uncle Sile

So time slipped on till her Uncle Sile
Invited her up to the farm for a while.
For her mother had writ she was gittin' thin
And she reckined the farm would be good for Min,
But she failed to mention—and here's the harm—
That the voice Min had wa'n't good for the farm.
Fust night she was there, right after tea Sile went to bed. "Beat out," said he.
"Twas a blame slick night in the month of June,
Warmish and lit by a lovely moon,
And Minnie concluded that voice of her'n Needed some air; so she took a turn Around the garden beneath the stars
And squalled her scales and notes and bars.

She'd jest got started in fust-rate style
When up to the winder piled Uncle Sile.
"Great Cephas," says he, "what's that 'erc touse?
Is there murder or fire around this house?"
Then he listened a while to the sharps and flats
And says he, "Gol jingo! Jest hear them cats!
I've heerd whole cartloads of tomcats squall
But I reckin them critters jest beat 'em all.
Consarn their ha'slets—sha'n't sleep a mite,
For I reckin they've started an all-night fight."
Then he grabbed his boot which has got a shank
A foot across it—sole thick's a plank—
And he fired it straight as a ten-inch bumb
Where the squalls were thickest.—It knocked her dumb!

It kinked her neck in some tom-dinged way
And 'twill never unkink, so the doctors say.
Wal, of course they lighted on Uncle Sile
For a-doin' her up in that 'ere style.
Sile said right off 'twas a thund'rin' sin
And he wouldn't have slung if he'd knowed 'twas Min.
But says he, "Don't jaw, for I won't stand that,
Ye ought to have warned me that Min plays cat.
It's reelly a wonder to me," said he,
"That she wa'n't shot dead for a loucivee.
There hain't no call for your gettin' mad
For the case could have been jest twice as bad.
Ye'd better be thankful I slung that boot,
For my first idee was to up and shoot.
Men allus is lookin' fur wives that's dumb,
But they don't marry angels from Kingdom Come."
And then old Sile jest shoved right in A bill for improvements performed on Min.

A piece of iron covered like Fig. 3 constitutes a horseshoe magnet and a straight piece as in the same cut is called a bar magnet. These must be of hardened steel and treated as just described after which they will retain their magnetism for a long time. If we sprinkle iron fllings on a bar or horseshoe magnet we will find the particles arrange themselves in definite positions along the lines of force. The space affected by or acted upon is called the field of influence. It is found that if a body be moved before the poles of a magnet in such a direction as

The following suggestions for the care of china have come to us from S. J. H.:

"In washing china and glassware avoid a too sudden change a too sudden change from cold to heat. One can wash the old family china and pre-serve the gilt bands longer by wash in g them in a warm suds of rain-water and dissolve a teaspoonful of gold-dust washing powder into it. Stir it up well and wash your pieces quickly; rinse in clear warm water and wipe dry on a soft linen towel. If water and wipe dry on a soft linen towel. If you desire a high polish rub with a cloth dipped in alcohol and then whiting. Let the whiting dry before rubbing them, rinse in clear warm water and wipe dry with soft old linen towels. You can make cut-glass and chinaware look beautifully clear and give it a high polish by adopting this method.

No soap should be used about hand-painted china, as it has a disastrous effect upon the colors, and leaves the glaze cloudy.

The cement for mending china is made of gum-arabic and plaster-paris, equal parts of each. It makes a paste which you apply to the broken edges with a camel's-hair paint-brush, and after mending set away to dry perfectly before using it.

and after mending set away to dry periectly before using it.

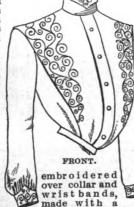

For mending stoneware china mix the plaster-paris with water, but it must be used as soon as mixed, as it hardens quickly.

I hope the readers of this paper will profit as I have done by knowing of these excellent recipes. Cements for mending are expensive and often not satisfactory, but this is perfect.

S. J. H."

We have had so many requests for some suggestions for practical fancy work, that we are going to illustrate the embroidered shirt waists which the ladies are making for the carrier which the ladies are making for the coming season. The designs are stamped on linen of the right quality and weight for waists. Some of the designs are conventional and some are of flowers and leaves. The one shown herewith is of white linen embroidered in white linen floss in a conventional design. This design is stamped on that part of the linen which forms the deep plait used so entirely this season which storts at which starts at shoulder and tapers to the waist. Strips are for the turn-the latter being with a point, instead of going straight around the wrist as in previous seasons. The back of the waist is simply stitched in double rows from the shoulder and little way down the back. These waists embroidered in forget-me-nots, using blues, greens and yellows to follow out the natural coloring, are particularly attractive when worn with a light blue pique or cloth skirt. Other designs are sprays of pink flowers, also yellow buttercups. When making shirts plain, use the Gibson model, which has this broad plait on the shoulders and is a particularly pretty pattern for heavy material such as pique, heavy linen and canvas. For the thinner materials, such as allower embroidery, dimity and lawn, make solid tucking, very fine, for six to eight inches from the shoulder seam down the front. Tuck the full sleeves, where they finish in the cuff, and make a tucked stock. Make all wash waists a little large, to allow for shrinkage, unless you have already shrunk the goods.

We have been asked how to make a good bath bag.

Take one pound of fine oatmeal, one half quart of new bran, two fifths pound of powdered orris root, two fifths pound of almond meal. one fourth meal, one fourth pound of white castile soap, powdered; one ounce of primrose sachet powder.

A family medicine chest is one of the necessities in the household, and every housewife should understand how to use its contents. There should be a place for keeping all the bottles and packages together, although it be nothing better than an upper shelf in the eloset or pantry. Then they can be found without loss of time, which is not the case where the bottles are left scattered about on the windows and mantels all over the house.

The home medicine chest should contain a bottle of camphor, some good liniment, a few doses of quinine in capsules, sweet oil, castor oil, paregoric, flaxseed, mustard, sulphur, vaseline, limewater, and various other things that have been tried and found good.

Should any member of the family be severely burned, cover the burned portion with linseed oil and limewater; then wrap it with cotton wool. Allow it to remain 24 hours.

I have given your washer a fair trial. It is one of the best washers I ever saw. It washed three pairs of my dirty and greasy overalls and overshirts in 10 minutes and washed them clean. My housekeeper says it would have taken her two hours to have washed them the old way. It will wash ten shirts, with collars and cuffs, in seven minutes. It will wash three washes without changing the water, only adding soap suds and about two quarts of hot water after the first wash.

An Electric

Send Your Application At Once To The Physician's Institute.

They Will Send You Absolutely Free One of Their 100 Guage Supreme Electric Belts, the Belt Which Has Made so Many Wonder-ful Cures—You Needn't Send Even a Postage Stamp, Just Your Name and Address,

Seven years ago the State of Illinois granted to the Physicians' Institute of Chicago a charter. There was need of something above the ordinary method of treatment for chronic diseases, something more than any one specialist or any number of specialists acting independently could do, so the State itself, under the powers granted it by its general laws, gave the power to the Physicians' Institute to furnish to the sick such help as would make them well and strong. Ever since its establishment this Institute has endeavored in every possible way to carry out the original purposes of its establishment under the beneficient laws of the State.

Three years ago, the Physicians' Institute, realizing the value of electricity in the treatment of certain phases of disease, created under the superintendence of its staff of specialists an electric belt, and this belt has been proved to be of great value as a curative agent. From time to time it has been improved until it reached that stage of perfection which warran'ed its present name of "Supreme."

This belt is the most effective of all agents in the cure of rheumatism, lumbago, lame back, nervous exhaustion, weakened or lost vital functions, varieocele, kidney disorders and many other complaints.

This "Supreme Electric Belt" is made in one grade only—100 guago—there is no better electric belt made and no better belt can be made. Whenever in the opinion of our staff of specialists the wonderful curative and revitalizing forces of electricity will cure you we send you, free of all cost, one of these Supreme Electric Belts. It is not sent on trial, it is yours to keep forever without the payment of one cent. This generous offer may be withdrawn at any time, so you should write to-day for this free "Supreme Electric Belt" to the Physicians' Institute. at '2124 Masonic Temple, Chicago, Ills.

To All Comfort Juveniles, Greeting. PRIZES! PRIZES!! PRIZES!!

COMFORT believes that among its thousands

Comfort believes that among its thousands of juvenile readers are many who have the gift of writing, and in order to develop this talent, not only for Comfort's benefit but for the benefit of all Comfortsubscribers not over twenty-one years of age, possessing the gift, we propose a plan herewith in which all who will may take a hand and receive a share if his merit is equalto it.

The subject for the Prize Essay for March was "George Washington", the first President of the United States. As there has not been time enough to hear from the juveniles on that subject, essays will not appear till next month, but in the mean time another subject will be given. This time it will be Theodore Roosevelt, not the last President of the United States but the latest President. All of the juveniles know something about this, the youngest of Presidents, and Comfort wants the best essays they can write about him in from one hundred to two hundred words. That is, an essay may not be less than one hundred nor more than two hundred words in length, and each essay is to be the best the writer can produce of his to two hundred words. That is, an essay may not be less than one hundred nor more than two hundred words in length, and each essay is to be the best the writer can produce of his own writing. The merit of the essay will depend and be judged upon its originality, its correct English, its correct spelling, its correct punctuation, its correct capitalization and its clearness of language and proper presentation of the subject. Each of these points will count so many, so that in this way the youngest and least experienced writer may have an equal chance with the older writers, who are not so painstaking as their younger competitors. Boys and girls are to be considered equally.

In order to make it an inducement for our juveniles to enter the contest a prize of $2 will be offered for the best essay; $1 for the second best; 50 cents for the third, and a yearly subscription to COMFORT for the fourth. As there are COMFORT readers in every state and territory in the Union and in British America, the writers from each state, territory and country will constitute a class and the writers in those casses will only have their own class to consend against. This will make a wide distribution of prizes and enable writers everywhere to share in the benefits. The only conditions are that you shall be a full paid-in-advance sub-

"YES, FATHER DEAD!"

It was his HEART, you know, it had been troubling him for a year. "How often we hear this story of neglected heart disease! It is increasing! 69 hearts in every hundred are wrong! Yet people won't seem to admit that it really is their heart but go on doctoring for something else when by the well known signs of Nervousness, futtering, palpitation, skipping beats, choking, nightmare, indigestion, pain in heart and side and many others, the poor heart is saying, "I am sick. Help me!help me!" And how strange that they don't send help when it means life or death to them and when the heart can surely be made right again. Not one case in 500 is incurable. How is your heart? You can tell better perhaps than a doctor, for you know your symptoms better than you can tell him. If you have one of them, or the least suspicion that your heart is wrong, don't wait! Find out! Even if you know that you have a settled heart disease which nothing has helped, don't give up! there is help!!

Send NOW for FULL FREE BOX of Dr. Fuller's Heart & Nerve Tablets, and book by our special heart physician, and get well! Both are free. This is not a box of a few tablets but enough for a good fair treatment, and to prove that they will give you back a good sound heart and nerves. This box cures many cases. The only remedy in the world which cures, not by affecting the heart alone, but also by restoring the delicate NERVES which control it. There is no other way to cure heart disease, and no other remedy takes this way. If we didn't know what the tablets will do, how foolish for us to make this offer. Isn't it worth trying, anyway?

You Can Only Have One Mother.

"Remember, girl, where'er you roam, With sister, brother, lover, Your haven will be always 'Home,'— You can only have one mother."

-Louise Payne Wray.

The beautiful and pathetic song of five stanzas with chorus and music (from which of her now famous song? the above is a brief extract) appeared in full in the March number of "Comfort." It created a profound sensation. We know of no song since "Home Sweet Home" first appeared which has touched such a sympathetic chord in the human heart.

The public is always interested to know the great authors of the day.

May we introduce all those of our readers who did not secure the February and March for this purpose at the suggestion of her COMPORTS, to the wonderful old lady who friends, it has been arranged with her consent wrote this song and music?

HOSE who live in the country often envy the city dwellers their pretty gardens, and they do this without stopping to ask themselves the question why they should envy them. Most of them notice a general effect and do not take the trouble to examine it closely enough to find out how it was brought about. Were they to do so, in many instances they would find that the effects they so much admire are secured by simple means, and that they could very easily have quite as attractive beds or groups of plants in the home garden, if they cared to make the effort. Now I believe that people living in the country ought to have prettier gardens than the city people, because it is much easier for them to do so, and they ought not to be willing to give their city cousins the monopoly of garden attractions. If they set about it with a will, they can speedily make "the other party" the envious one.

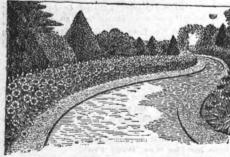

I find that beds of plants having attractive speedily one.

speedily make "the other party" the envious one.

I find that beds of plants having attractive foliage are greatly admired, but that most country persons are under the impression that they cost more money than they can afford to put into them. This is a mistake. Some very pretty beds are made with very little expense. Here is one; Plant three or four seeds of Ricinus in the center of a circular bed about eight feet across. These plants grow to be six or eight feet tall, and have immense leaves of green and coppery bronze, and are very suggestive of tropical climes by their luxuriant development. About these, plant a row of Amaranthus. This is a plant having dark red foliage, shaded more or less with green and bronze. In August, it bears profuse crops of flowers in long, pendant spikes, generally a rich Indian red in color. There are several varieties of this plant, and by buying seed in which each variety is by itself, one may have a tall-growing sort next the Richnus, with lower-growing kinds near the edge of the bed. As an edging, use the annual Euphorbia, with green and white foliage. This will afford a most decided contrast in color with the Amaranthus, and bring out the dark, rich tones of red in the latter with fine effect. It also serves to separate the strong colors which characterize the Amaranthus and Ricinus from the green of the lawn upon which this bed should be located, to make it most effective. A bed of this kind will attract attention from persons who would hardly notice a flower because of its being something out of the ordinary, and it will be sure to afford its owner a great deal of pleasure. The cost of it? The Ricinus seed can be bought at five cents a packet, and each packet will have seeds enough for several such beds in it. The Amaranthus seed will cost the same. So will the Euphorbia. That brings the cost up to fifteen cents, unless you use more than one variety of Amaranthus, in which case each additional variety used will add five cents to the bill. You see, from this estimate, that the entire cost of such a bed is slight. And as to the care required, any one can give it who can grow a Petunia or a Poppy. Study the catalogues, and you will find many plants in them which can be combined charmingly in beds and groups where foliage is depended on to produce ornamental effects. Do not be afraid to experiment. Don't be satisfied to copy, but originate. Aim to have something a little "different from other folks." One of the greatest pleasures of gardening consists in making your own plans, and seeing what you can do along original lines. If there are evergreens in the yard, group the Amaranthus where it will have them as a background, and you will be delighted with the way in which the colors of the latter stand out against the dark green of their foliage. Yellow flowering plants, like the Coreopsis, scarlet Geraniums, its green and white foliage heightening the vivid effect of the flowers, as only such colors can. Those who look into the matter will soon discover that we have a good deal of material available at slight cost, with which to produce effects quite as pleasing as those seen in many gardens belonging to wealthy people. Pleasing effects do not depend so much on cost as we suppose. It is the way in which we use simple material that tells most effectively.

No garden can afford to be without a bed of the new Petunias. Such beautiful things as they are, ruffled, and rayed with strongly contrasted colors, or veined and laced with them, in a network of lines that seem to stand out against petals of the richest velvet. And so large that you hardly recognize them, at first, as belonging to the Petunia family. No annual excels them in profusion of bloom, and if you go over the bed in August, and cut away at least half of each plant, new branches will soon be sent up in which flowers as large and fine as those produced during the early part of the season will be borne until the coming of cold weather.

season will be borne until the coming of cold weather.

Every garden ought to have a bed of Gladioluses. To the outdoor garden these flowers are what the Geranium is to the garden in the window. No flower is easier to grow, and no flower requires so little attention at our hands. Give it a rich and mellow soil,—preferably one containing considerable sand--plant it five inches deep, from the middle of the present month to the first of June, in order to secure a succession of bloom, and keep the weeds down about it, and it will ask no more at your hands. It has been a popular flower for the last twenty years—though never grown as extensively as its merits would warrant—but the varieties of today are so far superior to the old varieties with which we are familiar that we are bewildered by them. Such rich and vivid colors, such delicate and dainty ones, such wonderful combinations of them, and such great stalks bending under their weight of bloom. No wonder we grow enthusiastic over them. Words fall us when we attempt to do them justice. The only way to find out how beautiful they are is to grow some of them. Grow a dozen this season, and I venture the prediction that next year you will invest most of your garden funds in them. It could not be invested to better advantage. Some of the florists who have been experimenting with this plant, told us that it was the "coming flower." Now that it has "got here," in all its splendor and prodigality of color, we have to admit that they had good ground on which to base their opinion. I predict that in a year or two the Gladiolus will divide the honors of the garden with the Sweet Pea.

Practical Rifle Practice and How to Gct It.

HERE was never a time when the people of the world were so much in-terested in rifle shooting as they are today. On the continent of Europe rifle clubs are adding large numbers to their membership every year, while throughout Great Britain throughout Great Britain rifle clubs are springing up everywhere. The same wave has crossed the Atlantic and in the United States today, on a thousand ranges, young men —yes, and young women, too—are perfecting themselves in the art of shooting.

too—are perfecting themselves in the art of shooting.

The American people have ever been known as a nation of sharp-shooters. The grim look that our ancestors took adown the barrels of their flintlocks in the days of the Revolution, left an impress which years have not worn away. And, again, those awful years of Civil War, when brother across bristling bayonets, taught Americans the value of knowing how to handle a rifle.

In the long peace that followed the Civil War interest in rifle shooting died out and little was heard of target work. Men had but too lately been using powder and ball in earnest. Since then, however, and especially of late, rifle shooting has been forging to the fore and today there is no more popular pastime than target shooting.

The "cheese-box on a raft," as they derisively styled the little Monitor when she went forth to battle with the Merrimac, settled for all time the question of wooden ships. Commenting on that memorable engagement, the London Times said; "Whereas, Great Britain had available for immediate service 149 first-class warships, she has now but two, the Warrior and her sister ship the Ironides."

In precisely the same way the battle of Sadowa—when the Prussian armies drove the Austrians sides."

In precisely the same way the battle of Sadowa—when the Prussian armies drove the Austrians from their chosen position and began a rout which did not stop till the Prussian standard was planted within sight of the Austrian capital—settled the fate of the old-time musket. That battle was the first real test of the Prussian "needle gun" which was the father of all the guns that today arm the soldiers of Europe and America.

The fighting today is long range work. No longer do the armies clash together, musket to musket, bayonet crossing bayonet. The range and penetration of the modern rifle is too great, for before an army could get within bayonet reach the magazine guns of the opposing force would mow them to the earth.

army could get within bayonet reach the magazine guns of the opposing force would mow them to the earth.

The United States troops learned this in Cuba. They found out what the "Krag" would do. Soon after the Cuban campaign was ended, a body of troops were sent into the Northwest to quell an Indian uprising. The Indians adopted their old tactics of shooting from behind trees. But the soldiers simply smiled and took aim at the trees. The result surprised Mr. Indian. The bullet went unconcernedly through the tree and drilled Mr. Redskin on the other side.

The wonderful carrying power of the rifle of today has made marksmanship of prime importance. The modern soldier must be able to meet his opponent with a well-aimed bullet when he is yet a long way off. If he doesn't, his opponent will drop him. This condition has been met in the armies by more liberal allowances of ammunition for target practice. It is making the soldier a sharpshooter and reckoning his value to his country, largely upon his proficiency with the rifle.

Interest in rifle shooting, as has been said, has spread over Europe and America. Rifle clubs are flourishing everywhere.

Some of them are favored with a small rifles and light charges but it matters not what the arm, so long as the interest is there. There is just as much sport with a small rifle as there is with a big one. The small one trains the eye and the hand and the muscles of the back and shoulder and makes it easy for the rifleman to do effective work with a heavy rifle should he be called upon. It isn't the distance the bullet travels nor how far it cuts its way into solid oak that makes the successful rifleman. It is the power to hold the piece on the bull's-eye and the eye to tell when to pull the trigger. These can be as well learned in the house as on the prairie.

Recognizing the great revival of interest in target shooting, and realizing how impossible it is for the average person to secure range facilities for work with a heavy rifle, Comfort has met the difficulty with a rif each club assembles at its usual place of meeting and shoots the stipulated number of shots. At the conclusion of the shooting, each club will mail to its opponent a copy of the scores. Thus, the scores will cross on the way and neither side will know which has won till it receives the report from the other. It will add greatly to the interest if clubs are named after some of the famous generals of the army. the army.

The illustrations accompanying this article show soldiers in the various positions adopted by the leading armies of the world. The same positions will apply in using the air rifle.

GUN

The popular "Goo Goo" Winking Eye is what you must wear on your coat or vest if you want to cut out all the other fellows and mash the pretty girls. You can engage in conversation and slyly turn back your coat lapel and wink your "Goo Goo" eye so easily you will win the girl and fool the other fellow or if a ga funny story that is old and stale or not can bring your winking eye into play and turn him down without any hard feeling. The eye is strongly made of metal, the front is painted in natural life-like colors and the wink is produced by pulling an invisible string from behind and there is a long strong pin to fasten through your clothing. The whole thing is strong and durable and the most talked about novelty today. Every one is wild for one, every young man in the big cities has one and all the girls too. "Just because she made dem Goo Goo eyes" is why you should have one, so send 12c. today for a special sample. 6 for 50c.; 1 doz.

An April greeting to you all, my dears, and may its showers that bring the flowers typify the tears that you may shed which will bring something brighter and sweeter to your lives. Now let us talk together awhile.

The first letter is from Leonora, of Hayes, Ills., who asks a lot of questions about beaus and she is only fifteen. I can only say to her that girls of fifteen are too young to even think about beaus, much less ask questions about them. Wait five years, my Helen, Hendrun, Minn.—Your dentist friend may be quite sincere and honest in his admiration of you. Let him call on you but treat him with dig-nity, as he is evidently inclined to be too familiar.

nity, as he is evidently inclined to be too familiar.

Pansy, Myra, Pa.—Ask your brother to invite the young man to call, or ask him yourself some time when he is with your brother. Of course he is not in love with you. (2) A mole is a dangerous thing to tamper with. Ask a doctor. (3) "P. S." stands for "Post Scriptum." Latin for "writing after."

Rice Bird, Abbeville, S. C.—If the young man is poor and he will have you and your mother to support, don't marry him. You can support your mother better yourself. If she is young enough to help you in the house and the man wants her there then you might marry. It would take a column article on love to answer the other questions you ask, and then you wouldn't be sure.

Peggy, Lansing, Mich.—Wait until she is twenty,

Peggy, Lansing, Mich.—Wait until she is twenty, and get some other fellow. You may stay at your fiance's home with his mother and sisters. It is proper to ask a man to call. The escort who is inattentive should never have another chance to be Friend, Mountain City, Tenn.—In writing to your sweetheart you may address him as you please. But remember when you write anything that it is in black and white, and may make you ashamed some time.

Violet, St. Louis, Mo.—It seems to me that your only plan to educate the young man in English, is to teach him yourself. If he cannot learn under your teaching he cannot learn anywhere.

Broken Heart, Maysville, Ark.—Forget the young man. You will not find it so hard, I think, when you try. (2) It is hospitable to ask anybody to call again, and customary with a great many people. (3) If she can play she ought to play.

Daisy, Mars, Pa.—It is proper to go to dances with a chaperone, if the dances are all right. (2) Yes, girls may travel any distance in this country alone. But they should be very careful not to make acquaintances indiscriminately. (3) Sixteen is most too young. Don't wear a man's picture in a button unless you are engaged to him.

L. M. Z., Toledo, O.—If the young man wishes to postpone the engagement for a year it is your duty to postpone the kissing for the same length of time.

Sweat Violet, England, Minn - Introduce the Sweet Violet, Englund, Minn.—Introduce the man to the lady. (2) Haven't space to answer about the basket trimming. Use your own taste. (3) You might occasionally ask to be taken out walking or riding, but don't do it very often, and know the young man pretty well. Men don't like that kind of thing, as a rule. (4) It is no disgrace not to have beaus. It is a great comfort, at times. Angle, Senior, Texas.—You are too young even to be writing to me. Ask your mother.

Triplets Burston Kass—You sentertain the be writing to me. Ask your mother.

Triplets, Burrton, Kans.—Yes, entertain the young man on the front porch in suitable weather.

(2) He should not object to your going in a sleighing party. Still, if he does not want you to go, you should not. Nine o'clock is early for sleighing.

(3) It seems to be the custom to go home from church with a girl who has gone there without him.

(4) Don't marry an unworthy man, simply because you love. Be frank with the other man, who loves you.

Blonde, Anson, Me.—School girls may let the boys go home with them from school, but merely as boys and girls. Boys in school are not beaus, and fourteen-year-old girls should give their thoughts to their books. You'll have trouble enough when you are older.

Emillie, Marak, Texas.—Write a postal to Rand & McNally, Chicago, for the information you want.

Roxey, Nashville, Tenn.—Don't write to the man you do not know, even if he is a friend of your girl friend. (2) It is the custom in the country for a couple to drive long distances at night to parties. (3) Don't chew gum in the parlor, no matter how many others are doing it. The more the worse. (4) When a man fails to keep any kind of an engarement it is his duty to explain as soon as possible. (5) She might answer his letter immediately after he had gone, referring pleasantly to his visit.

Dove, Daisey, Md.—It would have been better not to have put your hand in his coat pocket, and when he offered you the cigarette you should have given it back to him, with the advice that he quit using the vile things and smoke cigars like a real man. Answer his note, but you are too young yet for anything but a pleasant acquaintance as you meet. A sixteen-year-old girl of your size should wear longer dresses than a small girl. Not long, but below your shoe-tops.

Violet, Columbus, Neb.—Trained nurses do not have to have a college education. (2) Certainly, don't tell the man you love him, unless he tells you first. (3) If he wants to write to you he will ask.
Olive, Edgar, N. C.—There is nothing in the Bible against second cousins marrying. In some states it is legal. (2) If you like the young man your sister did not marry, and he likes you, it is all right.

Lucile, Kunkle, O.—Girls should not marry be-fore twenty, nor men before thirty, in my opinion. (2) He does not. (3) It is permissible. (4) No.

Brown Eyes, Peoria, Ills.—Wear as many of the roses as you can and leave the others at home. (2) Thorough massaging night and morning with your hands will develop your neck and give it better color. Also gentle exercise of the muscles by moving the head from side to side and back and forth.

There, all of your questions have been answered, and nearly every question asked was indicative that my cousins are learning a good many things they ought to know without asking me. May we all be happy till we meet again. By by.

CONDITIONS.

To have one's hands read in this department, by Digitus, one of the finest living palmists, it is necessary to observe the following conditions:
Impressions of both hands must be sent, fully postpaid and having the name, address and nom de plume of the sender enclosed in the package also.

The package must in every instance be accompanied by the names and addresses of eight new subscribers at twenty-five cents each, the whole amount, $2.00 being remitted, with the package, addressed to COMFORT PALMISTRY CLUB. Augusta, Maine.

No notice will be taken of impressions and requests for readings unless the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

To take impressions, first hold two large pieces of blank for readings unless the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

To take impressions, first hold two large pieces of blank paper over a candle or similar flame, until they are heavily coated with the smoke. Then lay these pieces down, smoke side uppermost on a pad of cotton. Now place the two hands, palms downward, one on each sheet of paper, pressing firmly and steadily down, but taking care not to move the hand. Keep them so for one minute and lift carefully, so as not to disturb the impression. Have ready some fixatif, which can be bought at a drug store or an art store or made with gum arabic and water in an atomizer. Spray this over the impressions before they are moved and allow them to dry. Then they are ready to send.

Smoked paper impressions are the best. But if it is desired to send a plaster cast, take plaster of Paris and dissolve in water to the consistency of thick cream. Pour this into a large shallow dish and when it is hardening place the hand, well-greased, palm downward, in the plaster, pressing downward. Several minutes will be required to get this impression and great care must be taken in removing the hand, not to break the plaster. Casts are exceedingly difficult to send without breaking and should be very carefully packed in a box with the name of the sender written on it. Putty is sometimes successfully used in place of plaster. A good photograph if sufficiently well taken to bring out all the lines, can also be read, although in all cases the smoked paper is the best, if properly treated with fixail;

Bear in Mind that all the above conditions must be observed.

Also, that letters not complying with them will go into the waste-basket. Readings cannot appear for several months after impressions are sent.

READER of this department sends in a READER of this department sends in a long letter describing her hand and asking me to give her a reading from her description. That is an impossibility. The only way to have a hand read in this department is to comply with the above conditions and send on a good print of "Eliza" sends me a good smoked paper impression from which I infer that she is a person of steady nerves and reliable character. She is a generous, open hearted person, very versatile in accomplishments and also in her intellectual qualities and a great favorite with all who know her. She will marry young, perhaps at the age of eighteen or twenty but she will grow apart from her husband and by the time she is thirty-five will have separated from him. There was considerable opposition to her marriage and some trouble which really affected her heart quite seriously, but she has been protected from any evil consequences thereof. She is a person of great tact and strong will, well fitted to be a leader wherever she lives. She will be a great favorite with the opposite sex, being bright and vivacious, with a slight tinge of coquetry. She will have a successful life, although she will not live to be much over fifty, and her success will run to the way of riches. She will not have any children.

I have had a great many inquiries as to the best way of determining questions relating to love and marriage. I have studied the leading authorities in palmistry and have read many of the less well-known writers, and I think the deductions drawn by Cheiro are the safest for the average student to follow. According to deductions drawn by Cheiro are the safest for the average student to follow. According to him: "the hand does not recognize the mere fact of a ceremony, be it civil or religious—it merely registers the influence of different people over our lives, what kind of influence they have had, the effect produced, and that is in accordance with such influence. Now, marriage being so important an event in one's life, it follows that, if events can be foretold by the hand, marriage should certainly be marked, even years in advance, and I have always found that such is the case in respect to all important influences; and it is also natural that affaires de coeur, liasons, and such, can thus be singled out and divided from what is known as marriage, except when the liason is just as important and the influence on the life just as strong. Why there should be a time set apart in one's life to marry, or not to marry, as the case may be, can only be answered by referring to the other mysteries that surround us. If anyone can explain why a permanent magnet brought into an or signary room, has the power. anyone can explain why a permanent magnet brought into an ordinary room has the power to magnetize every other bit of iron in the room, what that power is, and what the connection is then be the island lasts.

When the line divides at the end into a When the line divides at the end into a drooping fork sloping towards the center of the hand, it tells of divorce or judicial separation. This is all the more certain if a fine line cross from it to the plain of Mars.

AMERICAN MEDICINE CO., Dept. 20k 47 Warren St., New York City.

For the benefit of our readers who live in the smaller towns and remote communities, Comfort proposes the organization of Comfort Clubs whose object shall be to add to the comfort of living by bringing people together for their mutual instruction, improvement and amusement.

Knowing that social pleasures are lacking in the smaller places more because people do not know how to organize and what to do that is interesting and pleasing, than because they do not care for such things, Comfort will undertake to suggest ways and means by which the young people, at least, may pass many winter evenings which would otherwise hang heavily.

First: The clubs, to be known as Comfort Clubs, are to have their membership from among subscribers to Comfort, and ten persons or less may constitute a Club. In communities where there are more than ten eligibles, Clubs A, B. C etc., may be organized, the objects of these divisions being to make it possible for sets of persons to make up their own crowds, for such meetings as they may wish to have. But each month there must be a regular meeting of the whole Club at which all members may attend and take part in the exercises.

Second: The monthly meeting should be held in some large room (church or town hall) and members are to read, rectie, sing play on some instrument, or act a short piece, the whole to conclude with some interesting game which Comfort will present. Comfort will also provide the program each month for the monthly meeting, so that members need only carry out the program which will be furnished them. Division meetings may be held at private houses of members of the divisions, and once a week if so desired.

Third: The officers of Comfort Clubs shall consist of President, Vice President, Secretary and Treasurer, four once a week if so desired.

Third: The officers of Comfort Clubs shall consist of President, Vice President, Secretary and Treasurer, four in all, and to be elected by the Club, once a year. There are to be no fees of any kind, but if at any time the Club wishes to raise money for any charity, small admittance may be charged at the usual monthly meeting. This can only be done by vote of the Club. Every member shall be entitled to invite two persons, not members, to attend any meeting, general or division.

Fourth: Each member shall wear a badge or button indicating membership, COMFORT agreeing to furnish appriate badges without cost to members.

These general rules, which will be modified and improved as the needs of Clubs develop, are now given as a basis upon which to organize the pioneer Clubs, and Comport will be pleased to hear from our lady readers all over the land concerning their willingness to undertake the good work. Comport will also be glad to render all the assistance in its power to ald the cause of making life cheerier and brighter and increasing good will and good fellowship among mankind. A special prize will be awarded to the first club organizing and reporting to this office, which organization may take place immediately upon receipt of this notice. Various annual prizes, to he determined later, will be awarded to Clubs for excellence in attendance, numbers, &c.

Address all communications to Comfort Club Editor, Comport, Augusta, Maine.

Method of Organization of Clubs.

Method of Organization of Clubs.

Let the person undertaking the organization notify six or more subscribers to COMPORT at the same postoffice to meet at a designated house, or room, and when they have come together, simply state the object of the organization of the club, as announced in COMPORT and get the sense of the meeting as to organization by naming two or more persons, male or female as candidates for President, first. Then pass slips of blank paper around for each person to write thereon the name of his or her choice for the office, and the one receiving the highest number of votes shall be declared president. Proceed in the same way for Vice President, Secretary and Treasurer. Then the person who has called the meeting will retire and the new officers will take charge, the President in the chair, conducting the minutes. The President will announce the program and call off the order of business naming those who are set down as taking individual parts.

The main idea is to have this part of the club's work as simple as it can possibly be, so that members will find the club being the greatest comfort to the greatest number.

GAMES FOR COMFORT CLUB. Distinguished Persons.

An amusing game is played by giving the names of distinguished persons.

An amusing game is played by giving the names of distinguished persons to various members of the company and having them guess who they are by the remarks made to them by others. To play this game, the President of the club, assisted by whomever he may select, writes on slips of paper the names of the very best known people living or dead and putting them in a hat or box where they may be readily got at. Then all the company is invited to go out of the room, and as each one is asked to come in, a slip bearing the name of some one is pinned on his back without his knowing who it is. Then another is saked in and another until all are in and each one has a slip pinned on, and at last the remaining slips are pinned on the president and his assistants by some of the company. All go about now looking at the slips on each others back and addressing some remark to each one indicating who he is and he must guess his name and character. For instance, if the name Alexander the Great were on some one and another should step up and say to him: "How do you do, are you weeping for more worlds to conquer?" he would be pretty sure to guess that he was Alexander. This would, of course, be on a man. If the slip were on a lady, and it was "Mrs. Carrie Nation", let us say, and some one should say to her: "Oh, you haven't got your hatchet with you", she would be pretty likely to guess who she was the first time. A great deal of fun may be had with this game, and when it has narrowed down to a very few who fail to guess who they are the company can have a lot of sport with them by asking them all manner of funny questions. The names of persons of local character, and every place has one or two characters of that kind, add to the amusement. This game may be continued for an hour, and the names may be used over again.

Charades.

Charades are always excellent for filling in the time

Charades.

Charades.

Charades are always excellent for filling in the time with, as they may be played for any length of time, and a whole evening may be given to them, so that everybody can have an opportunity of doing something. No paraphernalia or previous study is required. A word is chosen and two or more people come before the audience and act it out, the audience guessing at what the word is, Let us take the big word metaphysician, as an example. A young man walks in from one side and a girl from the other and they meet. She says to him: "How do you do. Doctor?" and they peas out. You see she has met a physician, and it takes pretty good guessing to say what the word is, if you don't know. A word of two syllables (not a pun as this other) is.—"Announce" becomes a little girl by her first name "Ann," and the mother talks to her on any subject, let us say it is the young men. In the course of her talk, a young man comes in and calls the girl by her first name "Ann," and the mother becomes indignant that the young man should be so familiar with her daughter. That is the first act—Ann. The second is a store, let us say its atc—Ann. The second is a store, let us say, and various people come in to buy, One gets rice, another sugar, another potatoes and so on asking for any number of pounds, and findly a little girl one say, and warious people come in to buy, One gets rice, another sugar, another potatoes and so on asking for any number of pounds, and findly a little girl of the girl by the rice, another sugar, another potatoes and so on asking for any number of pounds, and findly a little girl of the girl by the girl of the girl of

A woman's discovery By many years of constant study and experiments, I have perfected a simple, harmless vegetable remedy that will quickly cure all femile diseases, as well as the piles. It is nature's own remedy and will not only relieve, but will absolutely, thoroughly and permanently cure the ailments peculiar to women, such as falling of the womb, leucorrhea (whites), displacements, ulceration, granulation, painful or scanty periods, irregular menstruation and all the pelvic ills of women. It positively cures rectal ulcers, piles, hemorrhoids, tumors, itching, blind or bleeding piles in either sex. It cures promptly, privately and permanently without the repugnant methods in general use by physicians. You can escape embarrassing examinations, avoid humiliating exposures, cheat the surgeon's knife out of baptism in your blood.

The treatment is so simple, mild and effectual that it will not interfere with your work or occupation. Thousands and thousands of letters are being received from grafeful persons from all parts of the world who have been cured by the use of this remedy. The first package is free, send for it—send today. I know that a fair trial of it will result in your becoming its enthusiastic advocate and friend. With it lwill send literature of interest and value. Do not neglect this opportunity to get cured yourself and be in a position to advise ailing friends.

Consider well the above offer and act upon it at once. It is made in the sincere hope of alding you and spreading the knowledge of a beneficent boon to sufferers. Earnestly, hopefully, faithfully, MRS. CORA B. MILLER, 329 Comstock Bldg., Kokomo, Ind. ounce. The third act, the whole word "announce." may be done by a young man who stands up and as each per-

If he is a bright young man he can make any kind of announcement he pleases about any person present, which always provokes merriment. There are so many words that may be acted in charades that we will not attempt a list here, as every Comfort Club has a dictionary at hand. Charades should be used principally to extend the time, if the game of the evening is not quite as long as the company wish to remain.

Mrs. Margaret W., Rockport, Ind.—A chicken farm near Washington, D. C. in Virginia would undoubtedly pay if it were conducted properly. Land may be had within from five to fifteen miles of the city at from $40 to $75 an acre and on all of the city at from $40 to $75 an acre and on all of railroad or trolley. The section is healthy, best from the Potomac, and the climate is about the average of what it is where you now are. Churchen and schools abound and some very nice people have their homes in that locality. The Washington market is one of the finest, especially if you devote yourself to handling the highest grade of produce. $2,500 ought to buy a farm large enough for your purpose with a good house on it to live in. The roads through that section are only fairly good.

CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

HE Moon overtakes the Sunthis month at about twenty-three minutes of six o'clock in the afternoon of the 7th day, Washington Mean Time. In passing the Sun this time, the Moon partially covers the Sun's face making what is known as a Partial Eclipse of the Sun, to the inhabitants of that part of the Earth where it can be seen. It is not visible in Washington, our seat of Earth where it can be seen. It is not visible in Washington, our seat of government, and in the United States anywhere, but it will be seen in New Zealand and the islands in the Southern Pacific ocean between Australia and South America. The central path of the eclipse begins at Van Dieman's Land and passes southward towards the South Pole, thence northeasterly to the 20th degree of south latitude.

An eclipse falling in an earthy the earth" in the regiqns where visible and in those ruled by the zodiacal sign in which the eclipse occurs.

A figure of the heavens erected for the moment of the eclipse, shows the first degree of Scorpia rising, with Mars, Sun, Moon and Mercury setting in the western house of the figure. Venus has gone below the horizon and is in the 5th house; the great benefic Jupiter is in the 4th house; Saturn is in the 3rd, and Herschel is in the 2nd.

The conjoined luminaries in the 7th, so near the contentious Mars, is a feature of disquiet which is not agreeable. It points to some contention in the western part of our country in which our Administration joins, thereby inviting severe criticism by the people there, giving unpopularity to the Chief Executive and those in authority under him. Labor and granger organizations are vigorously recruited in those regions and controversies and dissensions are likely over railroad matters affecting the agricultural and cattle interests of portions of the west. There will be some unusual disturbance in prices of railway securities and incidentally of general stocks through the middle days of May and about the 1st of June.

Jupiter, in the 4th house, promises well for the agricultural classes of the country, indicating temperate growing weather with, however, rather more than usual heat and thunder and lightning for the season around the 20th of the month especially.

On the whole, the promises of the figure are good for the general welfare of the country, notwithstanding sectional differences and some inharmonies in the West. Our President should be on his guard during this lunation and near the 20th of the month. He should be careful of hurts from fire-arms and animals in all sports and recreations and be careful of the eyesight throughout the month. The Eclipse falling in the sign found to be in sympathy with Ireland and the Irish people prom-month.

The Eclipse falling in the sign found to be in sympathy with Ireland and the Irish people, promises unfavorably to them. There will be more than usual excitement if not some turbulent outbreaks among the people in the emerald isle. The indications are likewise poor for the agricultural interests there. Vegetation will be likely to be tardy or more than usual depression will result to their interests through political action. We trust that nothing serious will be the outcome of this eclipse in that section of the world.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR MAY, 1902.

MAY 1-Thursday. This month opens with an excellent day which should be fully improved for urging all honorable undertakings; buy goods for trade and have dealings with banks, persons of wealth, and all kinds of corporations, make collections, adjust accounts and solisit money accommodations.

solist money accommodations.
2-Friday. Give preference to this day in dealing with metals, machinery, cutlery, drugs, and chemicals, also for mixing and compounding; urge the pursuit of the mechanical trades and inventions; have dentistry done and surgical operations performed, except such as require incisions at the abdominal regions.

require incisions at the abdominal regions.

3.—Naturday. Begin the day earnestly and improve it vigorously for all commercial transactions; urge correspondence and literary matters generally; sign writings of all kinds except those pertaining to patents or trade marks; the evening is baffling and unsatisfactory.

4.—Sunday. The forenoon is the best part of the day and particularly invites communion with the poet, musician and gives special appreciation to the beautiful in religion, nature and art.

5.—Monday. Another excellent day, being particularly fortunate for all commercial pursuits; buy goods for trade; speculate in stocks and securities, especially if thy nativity also favor at this time; seek favor and money accommodations from banks and persons of means; deal with railway authorities and other large corporations or organizations of men.

6.—Tuesday. The forenoon is not to be chosen for G-Tuesday. The forenoon is not to be chosen for inauguration of any important venture and is more likely to bring hindrances or disappointments to progress of matters in hand; have no dealings with real estate men, builders, agriculturists, lumbermen or traders in such commodities as wood, coal, timber, lead, agricultural products, and boots and shoes; the afternoon is the better part of the day.

part of the day.

7—Wednesday. Partial Eclipse of the Sun, visible in New Zealand and the South Pacific occan. Be very cautious in thy money undertakings of this day; beware of speculation as bad losses are threatening; bad failures occur in business circles about this time and fraud and defalcations of magnitude come to light. The day is evil in a financial sense for persons born about the 9th of August or 9th of November of past years, and they will do well to husband their resources and depend upon mental and manual exertions alone without use of eash capital, to gain worldly goods or advantages. See that no fire gains headway in the early hours of the day and that disputes are not born of the passing influences.

hours of the day and that disputes are not born of the passing influences.

S-Thursday. Actively pursue thy several avocations during all this day, giving preference to the foremon for dealings in real estate, boots and shoes, wool, lead, coal and all classes of building materials; sign writings; execute wills, leases and trusts; deal with printers and publishers, civil engineers, surveyors, lawyers, trustees, and superintendents of corporate affairs; use the day generally for artistic and decorative work and dramatic engagements, and the afternoon particularly for social and musical entertainments and engaging the mind with politic literature of all kinds. The day is peculiarly fortunate for persons born about the 19th of March or May and the 21st of September or November, of past years; as such persons are likely to be now having more agreeable business experiences and improved mental conditions. The contrary is noted for persons born about the 18th of January or April or the 21st of July or October of past years, and they should beware of making changes in their business, should avoid the execution of writings pertaining to houses and lands and take good care of the ligestive apparatus.

ligestive apparatus.

9-Friday. The forenoon is not recommended as benevolent, being likely to give disappointment or hinirances to progress of matters in hand; but as the noon is passed let every energy be put forth and honorable transactions will meet with more than ordinary success. Repleniah thy stock in trade; have dealings with banks and other moneyed institutions; solicit money accommodations and urgs all commercial contracts to the utmost.

events of the carly morning unless the tongue be held well under control; the middle hours of the day are the best ones; the elegant pursuits are adversely affected in the afternoon, when no purchases of apparel or fancy or artistic wares should be made; the evening does not promise much satisfaction from musical or dramatic en-tertainments.

12—Monday. Use the early hours of this day for the more important transactions, but as the noon approaches and passes adverse influences are likely to arrest progress of matters or bring disappointment to hopes or plans. The afternoon is better for literary and artistic pursuits, study, mathematical and scientific labors as well as social and dramatic entertainment; do not have any dealings with builders, plumbers, lumbermen, or those engaged in buying and selling houses and lands, in the middle hours of the day.

those engaged in buying and selling houses and lands, in the middle hours of the day.

13—Tuesday. Urge all the literary undertakings in the early part of this day, when also give attention to the fine arts and all matters that tend to the pleasure and gratification of mankind. As the noon is passed and during the latter part of the day let all avoid rashness of word and act and be not easily moved to wrath; The day is peculiarly dangerous for surgical operations, especially when performed by the use of anesthetics or if incisions are made at the throat or groin or the urinary organs; some bad accidents come at this time; the day after it in the forenoon is mischievous for speculators and will conduct to bad losses of money. In fact, the middle ten days in May are likely to produce sharp fluctuations in prices of stocks and general commodities and persons in the markets will need to be unusually watchful not to be caught between the millstones. Do not make any purchases of goods for trade during the afternoon; keep watch of sudden impulses, not permitting the judgment to be warped by sudden rumors or developments.

14—Wednesday.—Give no offence to thine employer during the forenoon nor seek promotion or favor in public positions. Use the afternoon most vigorously for the affairs of life and particularly for great public organizations of men or women.

15—Thursday. An indifferent day in nearly all respects, though the evening and night hours are especially evil for all classes of literary work, mental labors, and mathematical investigations.

mathematical investigations.

16-Friday. Active and energetic throughout the morning, baffling in the noon hours, and excellent again in the afternoon; begin the day early for dealing in metals, machinery and cuttery and the pursuit of the mechanical trades and inventions; make no applications to public bodies for favor or advantage in the noon hours, but urge all undertakings to the utmost in the latter half of the day, especially if they pertain to building matters or transactions concerned with houses or lands or mining or agricultural products.

17-Saturday. Not particularly or agricultural products.

17—Saturday. Not particularly conducive to success in any of the great undertakings in life; look out for the pennies in the forenoon when no purchases should be made for trade or speculation.

18—Sunday. The best Sabbath day in the month; the efforts of the clergy will be especially happy and effective and minds dwell with earnestness and zeal in the contemplation of religious subjects; the day also gives special enjoyment of literary works of scientific and philosophical character.

philosophical character.

19—Monday. The forenoon is less to be depended upon than the balance of the day for assistance in conducting the major affairs of life; do not use it for buying such commodities as coal, wood, iron, petroleum, lead, wool, or grain. Nor should any contracts for building or repairing be made from 10 in the forenoon to 1 in the atternoon; urge all general business in the latter half of the day.

20—Tuesday. The conditions of this day are of little importance until the late afternoon and the affairs of life are conducted regularly and with no great success or much hindrance. As the night approaches, see that special precautions are observed against fire and explosions for we are now in the midst of a time when some very serious losses are likely to result from the flery element. Fires prevailing in these days will be furious and destructive of values and inflict unusual harm upon human beings. The fire losses of the month are likely to average more than usual and money values will be subject to sudden and marked changes.

man beings. The fire losses of the month are likely to average more than usual and money values will be subject to sudden and marked changes.

21—Wednesday. Be cautious in drawing thy purscrizings on this day, being sure that necessity rather than temporary fancy invites expenditures: money transactions do not promise well for the forenoon and the days hereabouts are likely to be extremely unfortunate in a financial sense for persons born about the 7th of May or the 10th of August or November, of past years. Such persons should avoid all species of speculation unless they wish to lose heavily. Those so born who are subject to troubles in blood circulation or in the heart's action will be wise to have care not to excite themselves or indulge the appetite too freely for rich and stimulating foods and drinks. Have nothing to do with patents or patented goods at this time.

22—Thursday. This day bids thee avoid quarrels with thine employer or superior: do not make any application for position in government employ and shun contact with principal officers of great corporations; the afternoon is the best part of the day for all matters.

23—Friday. A peculiarly happy day for the musician and artist. REGULUS advises his friends in all the elegant avocations to take advantage of the bright prospects for the inauguration of their most important works. Those matrimonially inclined who were born about the 4th to 7th of February, 8th of April, 6th of May, 9th of June, or 10th of December, of past years, would do well to improve this day towards the consummation of their heart's best wishes. Marriage now entered into in such nativities will be attended with a full degree of comfort and happiness unless it should happen in some individual cases the radical promises for such a step is generally adverse. Let all persons engaged in business handling the nice things of life—articles of dress or adornment of the gratification—fully improve this day for increasing the nice things of life—articles of dress or adornment of the gratif

24—Saturday. An inauspicious day; make no contracts, sign no deeds or writings of importance and have as few dealings as possible with persons engaged in the literary pursuits. Press-writers, students, mathematicians, and those engaged in the publication of books, contend here with temporary annoyances and unsatisfactory work; business contracts are not favored and are best postponed until the 29th of the month.

25—Sunday. The conditions of this day are generally favorable though the afternoon and evening conduce more appreciably than the early hours to successful or agreeable mental efforts and intellectual conversations.

agreeable mental efforts and intellectual conversations.

26—Monday. Conflicting testimonials prevail this day, though the forenoon is really evil for the fine arts and in dealing in artistic goods; nor is it profitable for musicians, actors, jewelers, or caterers to public amusements or entertainments; as the noon is past give preferances to transactions concerning machinery, chemicals, drugs, and the mechanic and manufacturing interests; trade in cattle, glassware, electrical apparatus and supplies, hardware, cutlery, firearms and explosives.

27—Tuesday. Do not engage in business connected with houses and lands in the forenoon and concern thyselves with persons in the dirty or laborious avocations. The late afternoon is the best part of the day, particularly for transactions with persons in authority or who are in charge of public works.

are in charge of public works.

28—Wednesday. Be in no haste to execute contracts in the forenon which is in general less to be depended upon than the time after the noon hour; mental labors will be less satisfactory and the literary affairs less successful; but as midday is reached let all enter vigorously upon their several pursuits; make purchases of goods for trade, deal with commercial men, bankers, judges, lawyers, and persons of prominence in public life; solicit favor or advantage from those having charge of public or corporation funds and concern thyself with patents and patented goods.

29—Thursday. An excellent day particularly for the contraction of the cont patents and patented goods.

29—Thursday. An excellent day, particularly favorable for travellers, merchants, literary men and scientists, and the forenoon should be used especially for the elegant pursuits and for the study of music, art, and the drama, also for dealings in decorative and artistic wares, dress, and apparel. Literary productions launched at this time will be more than usually successful.

30-Friday. Expect no favor at the hands of thine employer nor from public officials and avoid dealings with persons in trade handling furniture and furnishings of all kinds; give thy landlord a wide berth in the afternoon.

31—Saturday. Choose this day for chemical experiments and for urging all works of construction, also the mechanical pursuits; make contracts pertaining to masonry, electrical enterprises, excavations, and railway construction; have dentistry done at this time.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

HE complete tailor-made suit after suffering a par-tial eclipse, promises to shine out brilliantly again this spring. Never-theless, outer garments will continue to be worn a great deal. Not only such as can be included under the elastic term "wraps," but smart coats, paletots and capes, be-sides many fancy gar-ments.

ments.

Tailored skirts are made quite long all around, and on many a slight train is affected. Gored breadths and fitted tops finished with a flounce, promise to be equally fashionable. The former are sometimes cut so as to widen out from the knees, at each seam, so as to provide sufficient material in the lower part of the seam to make a plait. Very similar to this skirt is one plaited flat, the plaits stitched down to the knees and then hanging loose.

Some coats of the tailor-made suits are cut with a long basque, others with the jacket having rather short basques. Louis XVI. or straight-fronted coats, promise to be much worn. Then there is the Eton, with long points in front, and little habit, basque or "postillion"

The new coats and jackets, whether they belong to a suit or are intended as separate garments, will be made so that they may be worn ments, will be made so that they may be worn open or closed. Many have the wide shaped collars, more or less covering the shoulders, and all garments have the necks cut very low. Revers are very wide and trimmed with silk or otherwise fancifully ornamented. Great wise fancituity or namented. Great diversity of opinion exists in respect to sleeves. For costumes, the favorite style will be the double sleeve, the under one tight fitting and reaching down over the wrist, the upper one moderately wide, open or draped, and falling some way below the elbow. The new paletot sleeve, rather wide, is gathered in half way down the foreway down the fore-arm, beneath bands arm, beneath bands of trimming, and finished by a reverse gauntlet or funnel cuff. Some of the boleros or more fanciful jackets will have straight sleeves trimmed or with turn-back cuffs, hardly reaching below the elbow, and showing half the blouse sleeve or ruffles of lace. Evening wraps and dust coats will generally be made with immense draped sleeves. Homespun is a favorite material, and many costumes will be made of cashmere, but for the more useful kind of suits serge promises to be used.

Weilings are to divide favor with washing materials, some of the veilings have a slightly rough surface and resemble homespun, only much thinner, and some are almost as fine and smooth as Swiss muslin; between these two extremes there are many different thicknesses and textures. Small checks of the shepherd's plaid description are being shown, and the hair line effects are also resorted to.

The buttons for fastening coats are of many different sorts, some of them being extremely ornate,—those inlaid with gilding on dull silver and black steel grounds will be the most favored—also enamelled buttons, and for dressy garments, cabochons, formed of clusters of spangles, white pearls and pink coral beads.

A HOME DOCTOR

THAT NEVER FAILS TO CURE CTRADE MARKJ RHEUMATISM, NEURALGIA

Sciatica, Lumbago, Colds, Coughs, Grip, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, Liver and Kidney Troubles, Nervousness, Backache, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Croup, Nervous and Neuralgic Headache, Earache, Toothache, Heart Weakness, Malaria, Paralysis, Creeping Numb ness, Sleeplessness and Blood Diseases.

Such testimony as we print below from grateful people who have been returned to perfect health after all hope was given up is certainly sufficient to convince any one that "5-DROPS" is the most remarkable medical discovery of the century. Its effect upon disease is incomprehensible, and in many cases seems incredible. Many of its cures border on the miraculous.

HATTIE SMITH, Wausau, Wis., writes: "I suffered with catarrh for the last five years. No doctors could help me. Sometimes I was unable to hold up my hand, and was deaf for five years. After taking three bottles of your '5-DROPS' I feel better than I ever have before, and am able to work all day. I can truthfully say that '5-DROPS' is the best medicine for catarrh, and no household should be without it."

catarrh, and no household should be without it."

CURED OF NEURALGIA BY "5-DROPS."

MINNIE WATSON, Rowland, N. C., writes: "We have used your '5-DROPS' in our family and find it the best medicine we have ever had. My mother has been cured of neuralgia of the stomach of about ten years standing. She thinks it is the best medicine she has ever used. I know that your '5-DROPS' will relieve any form of pain, no matter what the cause may be, and I hope I shall have the pleasure of recommending it to many poor sufferers. May God bless you in your good work."

TWO BOTTLES OF "5-DROPS" CURED HIM OF RHEUMATISM.

J. V. WHEELER, Lyons, Mich., writes: "I would say that your '5-DROPS' is the best cure for rheumatism I ever used. When I commenced using it I had not laid down in bed for two months. Two bottles of '5-DROPS' cured me, I recommend it to every one, as it cured me sound wall."

WAS UNABLE TO WORK BECAUSE OF RHEUMATISM.

G. A. BARNES, Elizabethtown, Tenn., writes: I have been suffering with rheumatism, and was unable to work for over three weeks. My wrists were so swollen I could not get my gloves on. I tried everything I could hear of, but got no relief. I saw your advertisement for 5-DROPS and sent for a sample, and then for a large bottle. I used them as directed, and have not been bothered with rheumatism since. It is all you claim for it, and worth one hundred times the money I paid.'.

cured thousands and thousands of people who have been given up by physicians as beyond help; many were treated by so-called specialists and pronounced by them incurable.

help; many were treated by so-called specialists and pronounced by them incurable.

It is powerful in its action, yet absolutely harmless. It kills the germs which cause disease. "5-DROPS" is a cure for indigestion. "5-DROPS" is healthful. "5-DROPS" makes new blood, and plenty of new blood. "5-DROPS" builds up a weak stomach with walls strong as steel. "5-DROPS" cures your backache, makes your kidney trouble disappear, dispels that sick headache. "5-DROPS" renews your heart action. It is the greatest heart trouble remedy discovered by man. "5-DROPS" cures nervous prostration. You will have no sciatica if you take "5-DROPS." "5-DROPS" will make eczema vanish as if by magic, leaving you with a clear, white skin. "5-DROPS" is the best remedy known for gout. The worst chronic case of dyspepsia disappears at once before regular doses of "5-DROPS." You should always have "5-DROPS" in your home. "5-DROPS" cures earache, headache and toothache. The long train of diseases caused by malaria are powerless to your system the moment you begin long train of diseases caused by malaria are powerless to your system the moment you begin taking "5-DROPS."

POSITIVELY CURES RHEUMATISM IN ANY OFITS

"5-DROPS" will cure Rheumatism in any of its forms or stages of development. It does not matter whether you are suffering from Inflammatory, Nervous, Muscular or Articular Rheumatism. "5-DROPS" If used as directed will give instant relief and effect a permanent cure.

"5-DROPS" is both an internal and external remedy, which acts quickly, safely and surely, never failing to cure this dreaded disease. Swanson's "5-DROPS" taken internally will dissolve the poisonous acid, remove it from the system and cleanse the blood of all impurities, thereby effecting a permanent cure. An application of "5-DROPS" to the afflicted parts will stop the rheumatic pains almost instantly, while the cause of the disease is being surely removed by its internal use. Aches, pains and soreness disappear as if by magic when "5-DROPS" is used. No other remedy in the world will stop a pain so quickly or effect a cure of rheumatic trouble as soon as "5-DROPS." It is the greatest blood purifier in existence, and is a remedy that every family should keep on hand ready for use in case of emergency.

CATARRH AND ASTHMA

If you are suffering from catarrh or asthma, secure a bottle of "5-DROPS" at once. It will afford quick relief and effect a permanent cure of these distressing diseases. Unlike almost any other remedy it is used internally, and also inhaled, thus giving a thorough systemic treatment, which effectually kills the disease germs, and removes from the system all of the poisonous matter which tends to continue and aggravate these ailments. "5-DROPS" quickly stops the unhealthy and offensive discharge from the nose, clears the head, and breathing immediately becomes easy and natural.

TEST "5-DROPS" FREE AND CONVINCE YOURSELF OF ITS GURATIVE POWER.

A trial bottle will be sent free of charge to every reader of this paper who is a sufferer from any of the above named diseases. All that we ask in return is that you take it as directed, and you will find it all that we claim. It costs you nothing, and you need feel under no obligations whatever in securing the trial treatment which we offer.

NOTE.—Large size bottle (300 doses) will be sent prepaid to any address for $1.00. If it is not obtainable in your town, order of us direct. Agents Wanted.

WARNING. If any unprincipled dealer offers you a substitute for "5-DROPS" don't accept it. No other remedy will do its work. It contains no oplates in any form, No alcohol; no salicylates to ruin the stomach, or any drugs which only deaden the pain and never effect a cure. "5-DROPS" is perfectly harmless and can be taken by a child as well as an adult.

ters this season. We will have hats made in a material in one color and trimmed with materials that will exactly match it in tone. In these cases white and red will be the most popular colorings, although black of course will be seen, as will also light blue and pink to a limited extent. White will be the most prominent of all. It assuredly is going to be a white season, and in millinery as well as in dress effects is this the case. It makes no difference what the style of the hat is, white will be the favored color. Materials, braids, chiffons, flowers, ornaments, and even fruit and foliage will all be seen very much in white. Hats made entirely in flowers are very much in vogue. I saw one made of red geraniums, Tricorne in shape, and relieved simply by a cockade of self material, a bit of wide red ribbon and standing out in bold relief, a cabochon of pearls and rhinestones. A stylish walking hat was made of straw braid of a fine quality. The crown was round and mediumly high, being flat on the ton. The brim was wide with The crown was round and mediumly high, being flat on the top. The brim was wide with a slightly upward flare all around and bound with black velvet ribbon about an inch wide. Around the crown was some soft fancy silk slightly draped and more than half covering the brim the whole was then topped off by the brim, the whole was then topped off by a simple black quill. This is a very desirable and practicable hat besides being effective and chic in appearance. Quills are in vogue again and on certain forms are very effective and takveilings with a hemstitched border are in favor. Especially the chiffons, which really require and will stand far more ornamentation than the fancy meshes. Chiffon veiling draped around the hat will be seen to some extent; besides the hemstitched border these are adorned with little figures and designs in various colors, light shades being the most favrious colors, light shades being the most fav-ored. Diamonds and double diamonds, the double effect being obtained by the use of two colors, are figures that will be used very much. Other geometrical effects, such as circles and double circles, the one interlapping the other, are also favorite forms.

Everywhere we go those little linen embroidered turn-over collars force themselves upon our attention. White is by far the most popu-lar body tone, but besides this, light shades are seen, these being the same as are employed for embroidery on the white ground. Blue, pink, yellow, green, all light and having a pastel tint, are the favorites, together with black. There are a variety of ideas in the shapes of the turn-over. Some show the turn-over portion in a single piece, while in others it is split in the middle; again, it is shown in three pieces, and even in four, two on each side. They are not meant for particularly dressy wear, but for every day use they are most effective and pretty; besides they can be readily laundered and thus kept in perfect condition until worn out.

Now a word or two of the strongest Fashion Now a word or two of the strongest Fashion tendencies in jewelrydom. In gems, the turquoise still comes in for a good share of favor. The novelty of the season, however, is the cameo; this beautiful Greek gem is inexpensively imitated and is adapted to jewelry of all sorts. After the cameo come the large cut imitation amethysts, emeralds, rubies, sapphires and After the cameo come the large cut imitation amethysts, emeralds, rubies, sapphires and rhinestones, all are used both singly and combined with small pearls and imitation diamonds. The very latest buckle is called the "Dolly Varden." It consists of three oval medallions with black center, ornamented by hand-painted and enameled flowers in natural colors, and surrounded by a rich gilt border. It is in the popular dip-front shape, and the general style might be called either Colonial or Pompadour.

Curious Things to Know.

We know very well that we are born, and all of us are interested in ourselves enough to know what kind of a start the fates have given us at birth. Therefore this rule is something to remem-ber, whether it will always exactly come out, or

Monday's child is fair of face,
Tuesday's child is full of grace,
Wednesday's child is merry and glad,
Thursday's child is merry and sad,

Those who think Friday is an unlucky day will have to change their minds if they believe in the rest of this prediction.
Another form of the prediction is as follows:

Some rich man's bride;
Worn on the toes,

Worn on the keel,

Here is something about your fingernails which is worth treasuring:
A white mark on the nail bespeaks misfortune.
Pale or lead colored nails indicate a melancholy disposition, Broad nails indicate a gentle and bashful nature. Round nails show a love of knowledge and liberal sentiments.

Narrow nails mean ambitious and quarrelsome disposition.

Small nails mean littleness of mind, obstinacy and conceit.

Red and spotted nails indicate a warlike temper.

Nails growing into the flesh at the sides indicate luxurious tastes.

How much may be in these signs that is trustworthy cannot be stated positively, but many of them have been handed down to us from time immemorial and though implicit reliance may not be placed in them, a sufficient number of them have come true to prevent the entire discrediting of the prediction. Put them in your scrap book and make a note of their correctness as you go along.

"BUT WHERE IS THE BODY?"

N the 24th of June, 1898, Mansfield village was shocked and bewildered by the most perplexing and sensational affair in its history-a case that became ere its untangling one of the greatest criminal mysteries of the nation, even though it occurred in an obscure village in Maine.

I refer to the "Squire Brett Disappearance, or The Purinton Mill Mystery.'

At one o'clock of that day Squire Brett's middle-aged hired man was unconsciously doing the first detective work on the great case. The hired man was simply hunting for the Squire to tell him to come home to dinner. First of all he visited the Mansfield bank. He plunked clumsily up the broad stairs, half opened the door and leaning on the knob shouted this question at the treasurer, the only man in sight behind the grill-work.

"Squire hain't in here, is he?"

"Nop," returned the treasurer shortly, his finger on a column of figures.

"Well, it beats time where he is," said the hired man. "Here it's one o'clock and he hain't been home to dinner."

The treasurer cocked his head sharply and peered over his glasses.
"He was in here a while this forenoon at a

"He was in here a while, this forenoon at a meeting of the trustees," he volunteered rather impatiently. "He 'tended to some business and then he went off. I heard him say something about going down to Purinton's mill but I reckon he hasn't been there all this time. He's probably hung up around the village somewhere." The treasurer went to adding again and after the hired man had surveyed his absorbed countenance for a time he slammed the door and chunked down stairs.

the door and chunked down stairs.
"I don't know where in the Dutch to look for him," he growled as he stood on the sidewalk and peered up and down the street. The hush of a silent June noon brooded. Several farm teams were hitched in the village square. The horses were flirting their nose bags, looking for the remnants of their dinners. One farmer sat shielded from the glare of the sun in a store front's shade, eating his lunch out of a paper bag.

Ordinarily the Squire could be easily located on the Mansfield streets. He was usually hot in discussion with some one and always talked in a high-pitched cackle and with disputatious energy.

The foreman of the Mansfield Mirror office, situated opposite the bank, was just back from dinner and was unlocking the front door. He leisurely shifted his toothpick and called across to the hired man.

to the hired man.
"Was you asking about Squire Brett? Well, he was in the Mirror office along in the forencon sometime. I didn't see him 'cause I was runnin' the big press but I heerd him and the old man and Arthur havin' some kind of a talkin' match in the front office. What's the trouble?"

"He hain't come home to dinner and Mis' Erskine is some worked upabout it," explained

"He'll show up all right; nobody ever heared of the Squire gittin' lost yet," laughed the foreman disappearing through the dingey glass door of the Mirror office.
The hired man walked back down Main

The hired man walked back down Main street looking into the wide-open portals of the few stores and peering at screen doors of the scattered houses. He expected to see the Squire's little, nervous figure come popping out at any time. Though almost eighty years old he was, as the people of Mansfield village expressed it, as spry as a weasel and at most times of day the tails of his frock coat were snapping along the street and his roughened, old-style beaver was nodding as he cornered this and that one in vigorous argument. But now the hired man saw only dinner-filled burghers leisurely betaking themselves to the occupations of the afternoon. The only sounds emphathic enough to be noticed, were the clashing of the dinner dishes in the sinks near the screened windows in the houses along the

"See him 'fore dinner if that's what ye mean," said the storekeeper, expectorating over the edge of the store platform. "He hain't been home to dinner and that's what's ailin' us," returned the hired man. "Don't say so?" commented Hawkes with only a faint show of interest. "Squire's us'ly pretty reg'lar in gittin' home past here to his meals. Let's see! I noticed him goin' down to Purinton's mill. "Twas in the forenoon, 'long 'bout ha'f pas' ten. Quite sure I hain't seen him sence then. I reckoned p'raps he'd gone up 'crost lots to the house."

The hired man declared that he hadn't and started along toward the mill. "I don't b'lieve you'll find him down there," called Hawkes after him. "One or two people have been down to look for him sence he went past here—wanted to see him 'bout business, I reckon. But I let on they didn't see him 'cause they come right back."

"I'll take a look," said the hired man and he trudged down the rutted road.

Looked at gable on from the road, the mill seems to have only one story. But the ground slopes away toward the bay and the rear of the structure is three stories from gable peak to earth. And beneath all is a gloomy pit, its end open toward the bay, into which are sluiced the sawdust, slabs and refuse from the upper part of the mill. The hired man looked all about on the upper floor, peered through the dusty glass of the little office, shouled once or twice into the half gloom below stairs and then went out into the sunshine.

He looked doubtfully at the yellow water

Mrs. Erskine, the Squire's widowed daughter, a woman of fifty years, met him as he slowly mounted the piazza.

"For mercy's sake, did you find the Squire?" she demanded in a tone of mingled impatience and alarm.

"I didn't make no house canvass and I didn't know as you wanted me to stir any especial touse," said he doggedly. "I reckoned it would fret the Squire up if he should hear about it. I don't want him in my hair."

Mrs. Erskine looked at the man a moment, her eyebrows wrinkled in thought. Then she turned to a window that opened on the piazza.
"Grace—Gracie," she cried. Grace Erskine, her daughter, a tall, handsome girl of twentyone, fresh and attractive in her filmy summer gown, came to the door.

"Horace says he can't find your grandfather high nor low."

"Horace says he can't find your grandfather high nor low."

"Of course he is in the village somewhere," the young woman replied. "Have you been everywhere, Horace?" The hired man wiped his red face with his big handkerchief and made reply in about the same words he had used in answering the mother.

The little group stood in the sunshine for a time without saying anything—Horace stolid and puzzled, Mrs. Erskine looking alarmed and the girl apparently not believing there was anything to worry over.

"Grace, you'd better slip on your hat and run down to the village," said Mrs. Erskine at last. The girl fetched her hat from the cool entry-

The girl fetched her hat from the cool entry-way and half descended the steps. Then she stopped. "Oh, I—" she exclaimed, and a singular expression came into her face. One looking at her could scarcely determine whether it was relief or anxiety.
"What is it?" asked Mrs. Erskine hastily.

"What is it?" asked Mrs. Erskine hastily. Grace with the curious expression still on her face stepped back to her mother and said, "I do believe granther has gone over to the Corner. Cousin George rode up to the house this forenoon and asked for him. It was when you were down in the garden, mother. I told him that granther was down street somewhere and he went away. George seemed to be very anxious to see granther. Don't you suppose they got to talking about—about that matter and granther rode over to the Corner to see—her?"

"Cat's foot! I don't believe the Squire would "Cat's foot! I don't believe the Squire would go off like that without letting us know," said Mrs. Erskine. "He wouldn't—still, if some-thing came up—and George got to pestering him! How was George this morning. How did he seem?"

"He had been drinking, mother." the girl said in low tones. "He was cross and he talked about granther just as he did the other day." The two women looked at each other for some moments. Then the elder said with bitterness

The girl started Horace off to Dr. Martin's to see if by any chance the Squire had stopped in there to dinner. She parted with the hired man opposite the Mirror office after they had called without results at the drug store, the back room of which was the village forum for the discussion of all local and national questions. She paused irresolutely on the sidewalk and then with a blush on her face turned the grimy knob of the printing office, "M. Wing & Son, Props." A young man was sitting at a desk in the outer office reading a long galley proof. The girl started Horace off to Dr. Martin's to

"Why, Grace," he cried, leaping to his feet and advancing. Then his cheeke colored as he glanced down at his rolled-up sleeves and ink-stained palms. "Pity the smooches of the country printer," he said half bitterly. "You see I'm even prevented from shaking your hand."

"Arthur the smile in your dear eyes is to me

"Arthur, the smile in your dear eyes is to me an embrace," said the girl looking at him with the steady gaze of an affection bold in its innocent absorption. But her cheeks were crimson. As he was about to speak, after a glance at the door leading to the composing room, she went on hastily, "But I haven't time to trouble you now, Arthur. I know this is the day you print your paper. I have just dropped in to ask about granther. He—"

"I am almost afraid to talk with you, Grace," he broke in with deep emotion in his tones. "I am afraid you will not understand me in what I have made up my mind to say. Grace, my love. I know hat sent you to ask for your freedom. I am going to give it back to you, Grace, without obliging you to speak the word."

"But I—"

"I know, Grace, that I have been a fool to dreen that a country printer could ever heve "Arthur, the smile in your dear eyes is to me

"Arthur. I-

a girl with your prospects, but love blinded me."

"Arthur, I—"

But evidently fearing to allow her to speak he broke in again. "I say, dear, now that I realize the sacrifice that my folly was dragging you to, I am resolved to spare you explanations. I will give you up. Don't consider me a coward, Grace. May I not say to you that self-sacrifice is the best part of heroism. Will you not do me this justice, to feel that in doing what I do I show my love for you as few men would be willing to show it? I will not embitter your whole life. As you estimate me in what I do, so shall I estimate you. You cannot help it, Grace,—you are forced, even as I."

Again she attempted to speak, stepping to his side but he rushed on impetuously. "I want you to tell the Squire for me that I am sorry for what I said to him this forenoon. I tried to hunt him up and tell him so after it was over, but I could not find him. Yet it was hard, Grace"—the tears came into the brown eyes of the young man, "it was hard to stand and be called a cheap fellow that was chasing you only to get his money. And because I had dared to love you he has threatened to ruin father. He has notified the trustees of the savings bank that he as president of the institution orders them to foreclose the mortgage on the plant of the Mirror. That means that we must get out, after my poor old dad has slaved here all his life."

"But, Arthur," cried the girl, seizing his arm impulsively, "I don't know anything about this. Granther hasn't mentioned the subject for two weeks."

"I am sure I don't know where he can be." "I am sure I don't know where he can be," said the young man. "He came in here along about ten, I should say. He called father and me into the office and said his say. He declared that unless I kept away from you, relinquished all claim on you, he would order the trustees to foreclose on the mortgage. And trustees to foreclose on the mortgage. And that unless you came to me and ordered me to release you from our engagement he would make a will disinheriting you. I supposed you came here to ask for that release." 'I did not, Arthur," declared the giftl firmly. "Grace, I'll admit that I talked rough to your grandlether when he made those therets not

After he had gone I saw that father felt so bad about our little property I resolved he hunt the Squire up and apologize for what I had said and entreat him to leave my father out of it. I resolved to sacrifice myself for both of you, but I could not find your grandfather. I will see him, Grace. If I take myself out of the way matters will be smoothed, Grace, darling, I—"

The young man was just reaching out his ink-stained arms towards her when the composing room door was thrown open and the apprentice rushed in with fluttering proofs, "Your father says hurry up and correct them things," chirped the apprentice, rolling an appreciative look on them as he rubbed a grimy finger under his nose. Embarrassed and stammering commonplaces, the lovers stepped apart. But as Grace left the room she turned on him such a look as showed that her heart belonged to him, even though an irascible old man was trying to shoo Love from their garden by pelting him with gold pieces.

The situation in her love affair was certainly absorbing enough but ere that day closed Grace Erskine was confronted with something that drove even Arthur Wing from her mind.

Her grandfather could not be found.

The hired man came back from Mansfield Corner and reported that the Squire had not been there. George Brett, his grandnephew, declared that he had not been able to find his uncle on his trip to the village in the forencen and had returned to his store at the Corner. It was some time before the quiet village of Mansfield was thoroughly awake to the fact that its richest and most prominent citizen had been whisked away in some astonishing fashion.

been whisked away in some astonishing fashion.

But the deputy sheriff and a few volunteers finally decided that the case required some looking after.

At nine o'clock that night Jason Dustin, local deputy sheriff, stood in the mellow light of the June evening on the post-office platform and summed up the case for the benefit of the crowd of fellow eitizens that surrounded. crowd of fellow citizens that surrounded him.
"It's sartin the most sing'lar biz'ness that ever happened in this place," he declared, setting his segment of cheese in brown paper on the top of the stone hitching post. "This place has had a blame good hunting over but to my mind the whole thing is bottled right up down there in Purinton's mill." He extended his finger in that direction and the crowd looked down on the sombre clump of shedows marking the location of the mill and felt queet thrills along the spine. "The Squire was known to go into that fiill," Justin proceede, "but up to date no one has been found whose him come out. Grocer Hawkes says that a bout ha'f past ten he come along past his store, bought an orange and started along toward the mill, peelin' and eatin' the fruit. Treasurer of the bank says that Squire Beet hinted that he was goin' down to the mill of bus'ness with Purinton. Drawed $1300 from the bank before he started. Now, as I say, no one ever see him come out. All of ye know what we found in that sluice that runs from the upper floor to the slab pile under the mill. There was snips of cloth stickin' to the slives in that sluice. On the slab pile seventy-five feet below at the end of the sluice we found the Squire's tail hat flattened flat's a flounder and down among the slabs was about ha' of that orange he had been eatin' when he went into that mill. Did he fall down that sluice? Mouth of it is level with the floor! But he has allus known it was there."

"It don't seem likely that a man of the Squire's smartness would tumble down there, does it?" commented one of the bystanders. "Now if George Brett had fell down there when he was teeterin' 'round the mill drunk this forenoon lookin' for the Squire—" the man of the squire's smartness would tumble down there, does it?' commented one of the bystanders. "But if Squire Brett went down there," continued Dustin, "if he fell that seventy-five feat and struck that slab pile where is he now?"

"Would it kill him?" asked a man.

"Deader'n a nail in a hearse," chorused half a dozen. "All ye have to do to know that is to look at the pla ELLOWAY Junction. whence a short branch line leaves the S. R. & F. Railroad for Copper City, isn't much of a place. In fact, there is nothing of it except the station buildings and a water tank. But Jack Randall thought it the center of the universe and the dwelling of all delight just because Nettie Millett lived there with her Uncle Harvey, the station agent; while to Nettie no spot on earth could be more happily situated, inasmuch as Jack's train stopped there sometimes.

Jack was engineer of No. 304, which hauled the fast freight from Metropolisville. His run was fifty miles west of Crodsham and return. Two or three times a week he pulled up at the Junction long enough to leave the few cars bound up the branch, and it was there that he fell in love with Nettie-which was the easiest thing in the world to do-but it wasn't there that he finally got her to confess that she "liked" him, which wasn't by any means so easy. This latter took place in the cab of No. 304, somewhere along the line from the Junction to Greenwood, the next station east, where Jack's train sidetracked to let the Metropolisville accommodation pass.

very early in his acquaintance with Nettie Jack had deliberately broken that one of the S. R. & F. R. R's. rules, which forbids "anybody, not an officer of the company, riding upon any engine belonging to said company; and very often he used to take her with him as far as Greenwood whence she could return by the 3.15 mixed. These trips were ostensibly devoted to the purpose of teaching Nettie to run the great engine of which Jack was so proud—and she did learn to run it and run it well—but she also learned in the course of her studies to love Jack. studies to love Jack.

Now Jack was a noble fellow, and almost good enough for her, who was too good for any mere man; so that all would have gone well if it hadn't been for Uncle Harvey, who, being a cross-grained, notional sort of person, took a dislike to Jack and wouldn't hear of any marriage or even engagement so long as his guardianship lasted, which unfortunately would last another year. So there was nothing to do except to wait.

But all the Uncle Harveys in creation cannot But all the Uncle Harveys in creation cannot keep a pair of lovers from communicating. Jack at once proceeded to break another of the company's rules, this time Rule No. XXIV, which prescribes the whistle signals. When he whistled for Jelloway Junction he should blow two long blasts followed by two short ones—and he did when the train was not to stop; but when it was he used a signal of his own, consisting of two short blasts and two long, thrice repeated and ending with another short one. Expressed in long and short dashes it was this: "———, -," which said to listening Nettie, "I am going to stop," So, when he did stop there Nettie was at the end of the platform waiting.

They seldom had more than five minutes to talk

After a while Uncle Harvey discovered this arrangement and discovered it at the very worst pass ble time, as of course he would. One morning, looking scowlingly up from the tele-graph instrument, he said to Nettie: "When your friend, John Randall, stops here this morning he won't use your private whistle

"This morning!" she exclaimed, flushing red.
"Why, it's only 9.15 and he isn't due here till

"He's off his run today," interrupted Harvey, impatiently. "He's to come through at 9.20, running wild, to help back a heavy special from Crodsham. I've got the order here to flag him to stop and sidetrack here till the up express passes. But what I was going to say was that there mustn't be any more of this platform flirtation business. Mind what I tell you. I'm your guardian now, at any rate, and I won't have it."

Well, that was enough. Nettie had a pretty privited here were and above the couldn't keep still.

spirit of her own, and she couldn't keep still any longer. Harvey retorted, saying things which weren't nice to hear, and in the midst of which weren't nice to hear, and in the midst of the excitement forgot his orders and everything else till No. 304 flashed by the window, roaring like a runaway earthquake, and was gone before he fairly understood what had happened. "My God!" groaned he, falling into a chair, his face positively blue with terror. "I've let him pass—I've let him pass—and the express has left Crodsham by this time!"

There was no telegraph station nearer. Noth-

There was no telegraph station nearer. Nothing could be done to prevent what would hap-pen when No. 304, the heaviest locomotive on the road, should plunge with full headway into the road, should plunge with full headway into the express rushing at whirlwind speed in the opposite direction. The situation was hopeless. But Harvey, with all his faults, was a good railroad man. He instantly wired the facts to the train dispatcher's office in Metropolisville, and then called Crodsham. While he was doing this, hardly conscious where he was, he felt a hand seize his own, and heard a voice cry in his ear:

"Never mind that, uncle. Come quick-his ear:

"Never mind that, uncle. Come quick—come-with me—it's the only chance!"

Nettie had seen in a second what to do. Up the Copper City branch stood No. 76, waiting for the Metropolisville local. No one was aboard, for the crew, according to custom, were taking an hour off at the roundhouse, some distance away. There was no time to call them. Fairly dragging her uncle after her, she made him understand by a few swift words what she wanted, and then, hastening to the engine and climbing upon the footboard she slightly opened the throttle and threw back the reversing lever a few inches. The ponderous machine, gathering way with slow, harsh coughings, glided backward to the switch. Harvey threw it to let it upon the side track to the main line. Then, still backing, the next switch was thrown, the engine swung out upon the main line, Harvey jumped aboard, No. 76 stopped, shivered and then began moving ahead. Quicker and quicker came the coughs of the exhaust till Nettie threw everything open, and the great locomotive almost leaped into the air as it plunged away over the rattling tracks after the vanished 304 which was rushing to destruction down there in the far distance, and four minutes behind!

Harvey, by this time recovered from his be-

Harvey, by this time recovered from his bewilderment, stripped off coat and waistcoat, seized the scoop-shovel and began feeding the fire-box. On the engineer's seat Nettie held the throttle with one small hand and kept the the throttle with one small hand and kept the other on the reversing lever, while she only let her eyes leave the track ahead to cast a quick glance at the gauges or into the furnace door.

"Not too much coal, uncle," she would cry at intervals. "Only a little at a time, but often, and spread it evenly."

Pretty soon she began to ask him to look at his watch and tell her the time; or she would call to him to count the telegraph poles for one minute and name the result. There are so many roles to the mile and the number you one minute and name the result. There are so many poles to the mile, and the number you pass in any given length of time will show you at what pace you travel. Another way is to count the rails as you go over the joints be-tween them—but this Nettie could do for her-

At first these calculations seemed to prove At first these calculations seemed to prove satisfactory, and yet Nettie seemed anxious enough. She could gain on No. 304 at present while the track was straight and her engine was doing its best, but soon she knew the line would enter a hilly region, full of curved cuttings and viaducts, where skillful John Randall could run as fast as ever, but where an inexperienced hand like herself must slow down or be ditched. Then again No. 76 was an old-fashioned machine, and not to be compared with John's in any particular. The only hope was to get on as fast as she could while the track favored her.

Harvey knew this also, and he labored des-

Harvey knew this also, and he labored des-perately at his fire. The engine swirled and swayed from side to side till Nettie could hardswayed from side to side till Nettle could hard-ly keep her seat with both feet braced against the boiler head; and her uncle more than once barely escaped being flung out of the cab. They no longer spoke, for the crash and roar of the flying locomotive made hearing almost im-possible. The cab was full of smoke and halfthe flying locomotive made hearing almost impossible. The cab was full of smoke and half-burnt cinders and the heat from blazing furnace scorched their clothes; but still Nettie drove recklessly ahead. Now they entered the hilly tract, and the terrible twisting lurch with which they rounded the first curve warned her that she must reduce speed at once. It was hard to do, for she reckoned John could be but a short distance off, and a few more miles of the straight track would have brought her up with him. Besides the express was all this the straight track would have brought her up with him. Besides the express was all this time running rapidly to meet 304, and she had already calculated the place where that meeting must occur. It was frightfully near—so near that she dared not think how near.

near that she dared not think how near.

If the noise had been deafening before, it was maddening now, when the rock-walled cuttings sent back the vaulting and crashing sound with intensified reduplications. Every curve was a fresh danger since she pressed the engine to the extremest limit she dared at each one, and even then chafed in her ardent each one, and even then chafed in her ardent little soul because she could not go faster. She was doing all that might be done. John must be but a very little way ahead—probably he was now leaving one curve while she entered upon the following one—and yet she could not gain that very little way upon him. He would never come in sight, and would die unwarned, with her only a mile away, just as inevitably as if she had never come in pursuit.

But at that very moment of despair she suddenly thought as something she m'ght still attempt to save John—of one last expedient which she had not tried—and, springing up, she seized the whistle cord.

Meanwhile, without a shadow of apprehension John Randall was flying along toward certain death. The very circumstances which had placed him in such peril had made his mind perfectly easy; for, when he found he was not flagged at the junction, he assumed that the express was to be held at Crodsham to allow him to pass. Although this seemed a trifle singular it might be accounted for in a dozen different ways, so that all he thought of was to make his run as quickly as possible and thus shorten any delay he might cause the express. This was the reason why he, pressing No. 304 as hard as the difficult route would permit, had unconsciously prevented the rescuing en-gine from overtaking him.

There was only five minutes between him and the express now.
All at once he thought he must be going

All at once he thought he must be going crazy. Faintly above the racket of the hurrying engine he fancied he heard a whistle and—a whistle blowing a signal which no one but himself and Nettie knew the meaning of.
"For heaven's sake, Connelly," he shouted to his fireman, "get out on the tender and listen. Quick, there!"
Councily throwing a surprised glance at his against the heree current of air raised by their swift flight, harkening with all his might. He gave a start, listened again, and then made one tremendous bound back upon the footboard. "Yis, sor, yis, sor," he exclaimed, "it's from back behint us—it's the Jooction signal!"

"Hold hard, Connelly!" roared John, closing throttle, putting on the emergency stop, the reversing and opening all the escapes with what seemed like one motion, so rapid was the wrestle of his strong, trained hands with the machinery. The whole engine jarred and quivered and groaned through every joint as it slid on its motionless drivers along the screaming rails; Connelly, never looking out to see what the matter was, seized the rake and began drawing his fire the moment he could let go with one hand—for the sudden violent arrest of motion had nearly flung him through the window. But John shouted again:

"Take the flag and jump! Run ahead for your life, and stop whatever it is that's coming!"

As obediently as before, Connelly dropped off the board and bolted head over heels down an embankment. He was on his feet again and scrambling ahead almost before he had stopped rolling.

As No. 304 came to a stand John seized another flag and began to rush back along the line. Without having an instant to think in, and being utterly ignorant of the situation, his engineer's instinct had told him that such a signal from behind must mean "danger ahead," signal from behind must mean "danger ahead," and also that his swift heeding of the warning might create a fresh peril at the rear. He had, however, not gone many yards, when a locomotive rolled around the curve amid a cloud of steam, and brought up with its pilot almost touching No. 304's tender-end. John leaped aboard just in time to catch Nettie Millett in his arms before she fainted away.

Almost at the same moment another great engine slid roaring and hissing around the curve ahead and stopped hardly ten feet away. It had been a near thing, indeed.

Well, of course there was a great deal of ex-

It had been a near thing, indeed.

Well, of course there was a great deal of excitement, explanation, confusion and confession, which afterward came to a climax in a long investigation; but nobody had been hurt, nor any damage done, and so the officials were more peaceable than they might otherwise have been. Somehow or other Uncle Harvey got full as much credit for his volunteer firing as he was entitled to (I am afraid Nettie embellished the facts a little) and, this being put in set-off against his culpable negligence, he was allowed to keep his position. He naturally made no further objections to his ward's marriage; and John was appointed assistant division superintendent, "partly," said the letter of notification, "as a reward for your extraordinary coolness and good judgment in a perplexing situation, and partly because you must be a more than good fellow, or such a girl wouldn't love you."

And Nettie's finest wedding recent

And Nettie's finest wedding present was silver loving cup containing one hundred shares of the company's preferred stock. It was marked, on one side, "To Engineer Nettie, from the S. R. and F. Railroad." And, on the other bore this mysterious legend:

merry party of young peo ple came trooping down the street, bringing with them a general atmosphere of jollity and fun. They had been lunching at a nearby restaurant, and were now homeward bound.

"What's going on over at the old Owen store?' asked Jack Dennison, a college boy home for vacation.

"Why, that's the Methodist Rummage Sale!" "What is a rummage sale, Lou?" said Bruce Cameron, a distinguished-looking man, somewhat older than the others.

"Well, anyone would know you'd been in Paris or some other foreign place for the past year, or you'd never ask that question," she answered, with a rippling laugh. "Why they're all the rage here and every church society for miles around has had one. You rummage' through your attic and store-rooms, and whatever you find you don't want, or think and whatever you find you don't want, or think nobody else would, you send to the sale, and the managers try and palm it off on the unsuspecting public. It's a sort of exchange of rubbish, and they use the proceeds for charity!"

"O, charity, what crimes are committed in thy name!" paraphrased Bruce.

"Let's go in," suggested one of the girls, and so, with laughter and jest, they crossed the street and soon stood in front of a window containing a most curious collection of odds and ends.

"I'll keep it as a souvenir, Lou," he said, laughingly. "It is like you, bright and cheery! I won't come in now, but will call later on. My regards to the family. Good night," and unlocking the door for her, he lifted his hat, and then walked on toward his own home.

Somehow his thoughts were not of his experiences abroad, nor of the years he had been devoting to his studies. He was thinking of his vacations passed in the little city, of the friends of his boyhood, and finally, as they had done so often, they centered around a face of dainty brightness, Margaret Sherwood's, "that old sweetheart of mine!"

estrangement.

There was one thing, trivial in itself, and it seemed to him now as he thought of days agone, such a very trifling matter, but which in his "salad days" had seemed very significant, and that was when at college one day he had gone into one of the fellows' rooms—Royce Manning's, Lou's brother—the one whom he had seen Margaret with more than he fancied, and a group of the boys were locking at a society pin Royce held in his hand. As he came in he thought he heard his name mentioned, and as they turned and saw him they stopped talking, and Royce quickly slipped the pin in his pocket. It was an exceedingly small matter but it had bothered him, and he remembered that Margaret had not worn his pin when he last saw her, nor, as he thought of it, had she for some time. He finally decided that in some way it was his pin which Royce had that day and that Margaret had allowed him to have it. Little by little, as he watched them, he decided that the there was some understanding between Little by little, as he watched them, he decided that there was some understanding between them, and so, gradually, the two who had been such close friends—yes, and more than friends—diffred aparts -drifted apart.

His trip abroad had come to him as a surprise and he had left hurriedly, merely writing Margaret a formal note of goodby and giving no address.

Through the years of separation he had thought of her often, and when gazing at some especially beautiful landscape, or before an exquisite work of art, his thought went out to her instinctively. Now that he was back again in the dear home city, his longing for her was even greater, and Lou had told him that Margaret was in California.

He was at his door before he realized it and even greater, and Lou had told him that Margaret was in California.

He was at his door before he realized it, and putting aside his unhappy thoughts he ran up the steps, as he used to do, for he always felt like a boy again when at the old house.

His mother was dining out, so Bruce, throwing off his coat and hat, went into the dining room and ate in solitary state. As he came out, and was going up to his den for a smoke, the bit of color on his coat attracted his attention, and untying it, he took it with him upstairs. It had had a strangely familiar look from the first, but he had seen hundreds like it, so this caused him no surprise. "Why, it might be one mother had 'rummaged' from my cast-offs," he thought. He still held it in his hand, a long, narrow piece of crimson silk. Turning it over, his eye caught a faint initial, and taking it up nearer the light, he examined it carefully. He could make out part of a letter, which he called an L, then an S, and finally the first one, he decided was an M. "M. L. S.," he said slowly, and then with a start recognized the initials of the girl of whom he had been thinking: Margaret L. Sherwood!

He looked more closely. Yes, written with pencil on the white silk lining, were surely the initials he had repeated. But how could it be Margaret's tie? And then he remembered that her mother was one of the pillars of the Methodist church and probably was one of the chief instigators of the wonderful Rummage Sale, which had struck him as so extremely foolish. What more natural than that she should search through her daughter's belongings and seize upon this bright tie, which really was quite upon this bright tie, which really was quite presentable.

Leaning back in his chair, his thoughts turned again to Margaret. How during the warm days she dressed so frequently in white, and had often, out of compliment to him, worn and had often, out of compliment to him, worn his college colors. He thought of the night of the float, when they had so gaily decorated his canoe with lanterns and flags, and she sat among the bright cushions, dressed in white, with crimson at her throat and a bright Tam O'Shanter on her head. That was the night he had given her the fraternity pin, with his initials and the name of his charge, and he had ne had given her the traternity pin, with his initials and the name of his charge, and he had told her how much it signified to him. She had pinned it on the crimson tie, and they had been so happy together out on the lake, after the carnival was over.

And then the other fellow had come between them. How fooligh it all seemed to him now.

them. How foolish it all seemed to him now.

And then the other fellow had come between them. How foolish it all seemed to him now. She was not engaged, so his little confidant had told him. If she were in the city tonight he would go to her and beg her forgiveness.

* He had been fingering the tie when these thoughts went through his mind, and suddenly he became conscious that his fingers had come in contact with something hard, inside the lining. Turning it over he looked at it. Yes, there was something there. He noticed a little rip at the side, and taking his knife he made it larger. Pulling out the lining something fell out and rolled under the couch. Quickly pushing it aside, a faint glitter met his eye. He picked up the object, and caught his breath sharply, as he recognized the well-known outlines of the shield, the symbol of his college fraternity. Hastily turning it over he read with rising color his own initials, and those of his college and charge.

He stared at it a moment in blank amazement. "My pin, and in Margaret's tie," he said bewildered. "I don't understand it."

He walked across the room and leaned his head on the mantel, looking into the blazing fire, and pressed the tie and pin to his lips.

On the shelf was a piece of bric-a-brac, a foreign bit some of his friends had sent him, and which he had used as a receptacle for his mail. The maid had been accustomed to take it from the postman, and, when he was in the city, leave his personal mail there. As he glanced the postman, and, when he was in the city, leave his personal mail there. As he glanced up, this happened to catch his eye. Almost unconsciously he picked it up, and gave it a little shake as he used to do. To his surprise something, the corner of which was wedged captain's vigorous pinch on his neck and into a crease, rattled round inside. He pulled it out, thinking it was a piece of waste paper, and was more than astonished to find it a little box, directed to himself. With a start, he recognized Margaret's well-known hand.

"What in Heaven's name is this," he said, tearing off the wrappers, and there glittering among the cotton was another society pin, the exact duplicate of the one he had found in the tie.

"Well, this is getting a little creepy! Two pins just alike. This seems to be a night of surprises," he gasped, as pulling at the cotton he found a tightly folded note.
Rushing to his desk and turning on all the Finding I couldn't buy one, I got Royce Manning to arrange it for me, and I send the new one to you, as somehow we seem not as good friends as we used to be, and I feel you may like it again. Is it something I have done, Bruce? I send this to your home address, as they tell me you're to be here this week."

And the date was four years old!

"My God!" he groaned, as he read the words again and again to grasp their full meaning.

"What bitter fate has kept me from getting this! It must have come just before I sailed for Europe and was overlooked in the rush and none of us have been here since. This is why she and Royce appeared such good friends. My dear, sweet Margaret, what must you think of me now. 'Is it something I have done, Bruce?" I know what those words cost her. My foolish, damnable pride has perhaps spoiled both our lives! O, my love, if you weren't so far away!"

Starting up with a sudden thought he rushed down stairs, and a moment after the outside door slammed behind him.

"Why, Bruce, where are you going?" she exclaimed.
"I'm going to Chicago. Mrs. Sherwood tells me Margaret will stop there on her way home from California this week, and I thought perhaps she might be lonesome coming all the way alone. You know I haven't seen her in a long while, and, mother, I—want—to." Going over to her, in his old boyish way, he threw himself down on the rug and with his head in her lap, told the whole story.
"O, those careless maids!" she said, then added lovingly. "My dear boy, may God speed you on your errand."

It was several days later that two telegrams came to the waiting mothers, which read: "Rah! Rah! Rah! Harvard!"

"Bruce."

Though couched in college phraseology, they read between the lines, and knew that the lovers, so long separated, were at last united.

SYNOPSIS.

(Synopsis. Cap. Skote Gregg of Hobb's Harbor, Me., master of the coaster Susan P. Gregg, meets a fascinating widow while visiting his cousin in Newport, R. I. He shows such attentions to her that his cousin's wife threatens to inform her old friend, Sophy Maxwell in Hobb's Harbor, to whom Cap. Gregg has been engaged for thirty years. The captain, on his next visit to Newport, sends his man of all work of the schooner to carry a message to the widow. The young man, who is offended because the captain is betraying Sophy Maxwell, returns with the alarming message that the widow is married again and that her husband is in full chase. The Susan is hustled out of Newport Harbor and all sail is made for the coast of Maine. On the way, after the captain asserts over and over that he is glad that he has found out in time what a deceiver the widow is, Seth, the crew, confesses that he "only made believe" go to the widow's house. He imagined from what the captain was saying that he was cured of his infatuation. But Gregg chases the boy up the mast and he is still clinging in the rigging when the captain works the schooner single handed into Hobb's Harbor).

HIS sudden panic Skipper Skote Gregg suspected that the knot of men at the corner of the lane were purposing to hold him up and deliver him over to the enemy, July Ann. He believed there were men in the village mean enough to aid and abet mischief in that manner. He swung his arms and velled as though he were shooting catamounts from his path.

"Dol bing ye," he clamored, "git out of my way or I'll squench ye like jelly fish in a whale's gullet!"

His mien was so ferocious as he came slamming down the street,—spatting the dust under his broad-soled boots, the men separated unceremoniously. They left Seth, the "crew" of the Susan P. Gregg, standing like a statue in the middle of the road.

Seth had expected neither of two things: first that the skipper would run away thus incontinently from a mere woman, nor that the crowd of men around him would disintegrate so suddenly. He was too surprised and too scared to run. He stood there stock-still with arms hanging at his side and his mouth open, staring like a fascinated bird at the skipper as he galloped up to him.

Without stopping a moment the skipper grabbed Seth by the collar and forced him along in flight. The terrified Seth made no picked up his heels in good earnest. He feared to flee with this furious man, and yet he feared still more acutely to refuse to flee. At every step he was running away from all he loved and into unknown dangers but he dared not look back, even. The way of retreat was clear to the wharf. All the population of Hobb's Harbor had been assembled about the Gregg house. With the pursuers still rods behind, the skipper reached the wharf, ran along the uneven planking and jammed Seth down the wooden ladder leading to the dory float.

"Git into that bo't," roared Gregg. He threw off the painter, splashed the oars into the water and sent the yawl swooping with lusty strokes out across the harbor toward the schooner. Twas but a short distance to row and already out across the harbor toward the schooner. 'Twas but a short distance to row and already he was driving the blubbering Seth up over the dingy bulwark when July Ann came marshalling her following out on the end of the wharf. "Skote Gregg," she shrilled, "stop right where ye be. I forbid ye to step foot on that schooner or to touch rope, sheet or halyard till the prop'ty rights of her has been settled. Don't you dast to make a move."

The skipper made no reply. With a growl

The skipper made no reply. With a growl and an oath he sent Seth forward to commence warping up the anchor. He threw off hiscoat and set to work shaking out the canvas. "Stop him, you men." screemed July App.

"Stop him, you men," screamed July Ann, dancing about in her frenzy, "I order you to stop him. He's runnin' off with my prop'ty."

But no one made a move. It was considered strictly a family affair and furthermore the skipper, treading his own quarter deck, was not the same individual who trudged modestly about the streets of the village.

skipper, treading his own quarter deck, was not the same individual who trudged modestly about the streets of the village.

"You're a thief and a pirut and a deceiver of poor women and a breaker of hearts and I tell ye not to dast to run away with my part of that schooner that was left to us, share and share alike," screamed his sister.

Gregg lent a hand and helped Seth make fast the anchor. The schooner was already drifting on the slow and heaving tide.

"Ye're a mis'able black-legged thief," shrieked his sister. "I'll hav'ye put into state prison if ye run away with my part of that schooner."

Cap. Gregg finished taking up the last slack in the fore-peak halyard, while Seth sagged on the line. The taunts evidently stung him a bit. He stepped to the rail and bellowed between his hands:

"I want ye to understand, Mis' Gregg, and all the rest of ye there that I'm actin' within my rights. I'm the oldest and I own one-ha't of this schooner. Bein' the oldest I have first ch'ice and I choose the stern end. I'm goin' to steer the starn end away from this dol-huttered pen of meddlers. If ye want to come out and anchor your bow end, come along and anchor it—if you can."

This bit of grim satire was answered by a yell from July Ann and by a shout of laughter from the spectators. Gregg lent Seth a swift kick to center the youth's attention on the hoisting of the mainsail, and then yeap—yeap! the black canvas swung up with the blocks creaking.

"I'll give any man that rows me out to that schooner taw dollers "cried July Ann July Ann schoolers and july Ann july Ann schoolers are in the place of the schooler they dollers "cried July Ann July Ann schooler and then yeap—yeap! the black canvas swung up with the blocks creaking.

"I'll give any man that rows me out to that schooner tew dollars," cried July Ann, livid in her rage. "I'll give tew men tew dollars apiece!"

After a moment's hesitation a couple of After a moment's hesitation a couple of brawny fishermen accepted the wage and in a jiffy July Ann was sitting in the stern of a dory, rocking like a coxswain and inspiring the men to row by her shrill cries. The Susan had already got under some headway but the wind in the cove was light and baffling and the dory, propelled by the strong arms of the fishermen, speedily overhauled her.

a bone in her mouth, he rattled down the companionway, and the next moment appeared at the rail with a gun across his arm.

"Row me right up to her," commanded the feminine captain of the boarders. "Row me right up close so I can hop aboard."

"Say, reckon ye'd better not come too close," remarked the skipper with a certain dryness in his tones that was ominous. The rowers held up and the dory rode along, the oars trailing in the water. They looked first at July Ann and then at the skipper standing grimly at the and then at the skipper standing grimly at the

and then at the skipper standing grimly at the rail.

"Row me up there, drat yer hides!" the sister screamed. "I hain't afeared of him nor of any Gregg that ever chawed codfish."

"I hain't makin' any loud talk about this," said the skipper, "but the' hain't nobody goin' to step aboard this schooner, not this eve. Them as takes warnin' don't git hurt."

"Look here, Cap!" said one of the fishermen, "we ain't tryin' to mess in too much and we don't keer to have ye p'ntin' no gun too promiscuous at us. But we do think ye're goin' back on your word a little mite. Ye said as how Miss Gregg might come out and anchor her ha'f of the schooner. Ye ought to stand to your word."

"Do ye pretend that ha'f the schooner haint mine by the will our father made?" cried July Ann.

"Ain't westendia! nothin' about it' retorted."

"Ain't pretendin' nothin' about it,' retorted the skipper. "I've changed my mind. I've been chased out of this town and mollowhopsed and abused and now I'm all done with all of ye.

and abused and now I'm all done with all of ye. I've turned pirut."

He straddled one leg over the rail and rested there calmly. "Don't never take no chances with piruts," he continued. "They're dangerous critters. I'm a pirut." He clicked back the lock of the gun and ordered Seth to trim sail and take the wheel. The sheets swung with clanking of the blocks and as the breeze filled her sails the Susan gathered headway. For a short quarter of a mile the dory followed spasmodically, July Ann entreating, commanding, shrieking. But she could not induce the men to let her near the schooner.

"We'd do as much for you as we would "We'd do as much for you as we would for any one in the village," said one of them, "but we hain't ever been brought up, Mis' Gregg, to tussle piruts. I reckin ye'll have to hire some men that takes more to fightin' than we do."

we do."

They turned the dory and rowed solemnly back to the wharf. July Ann from the stern brandished her fists and screamed maledictions on the head of her brother until voice failed her and the Susan slopped around the head of the Cow Nubble and headed into the roll of the Atlantic

Cap. Gregg did not speak to Seth for nearly two hours. The youth sat disconsolately on the scuttle butt. Once or twice he dared to glance in the direction of the skipper and found that worthy glaring at him so ferociously that he dropped his eyes promptly and sat trembling. Finally Gregg growled, "I s'pose ye have got enough wit in that oakum ball of a head of your'n to realize that ye have turned me into a pirut, haintye?"

Seth nodded with a ierk and caught a sob.

that ever are, don't ye?"

Another nod and a shiver.

"And ye know what the piruts do to them that mutiny and them that get into their power, hey?"

Seth wriggled to his knees. "I didn't do it a-puppus, Cap'n Gregg," he wailed. "I meant all right, but 'twas dragged out of me by a woman, who kept at me till I didn't know which end I wasstandin' on." The boy broke out into blubberings. "Don't cut me up in inch pieces and make me walk the plank like the piruts do, Cap'n Gregg! Women is dretful deceivin' critters and they went and made me deceivin' critters and they went and made

1. The only American woman who holds a title from the Pope of Rome is the Countess Spottiswood-Mackin who was originally a Protestant. The Pope recently gave an audience to the Countess and expressed his satisfaction at the progress of Catholicism in America.

2. Arctic exploration will never lose interest or lack to brave its dangers as long as the North Pole remains undiscovered. The latest and best equipped expedition sent out is that under Evelyn Baldwin by William Zeigler, a millionaire of Brooklyn, N. Y., and known as the Baldwin-Zeigler expedition. This expedition sailed in June of last year, and word lately received from it says it has reached a point 80 degrees 24 minutes north, and that parties would be sent on north to establish supply stations every twenty miles. The expedition has 400 dogs for sledges.

3. One of the pretty girls of Washington City to make a national reputation for beauty is Miss Showalter, daughter of Representative Showalter of Pennsylvania. Miss Showalter is as popular as she is pretty.

4,5. On the first of January last the Reform administration began in New York City with Tammany Hall forced from power, and great promises were made. Already, however, the air is tilled with discord, and Mayor Low's policy of being easy on saloon keepers and not insisting upon their obeying the Sunday closing law which is opposed by District Attorney Jerome is making divisions among the reformers which Tammany looks upon with great satisfaction.

6. It is very seldom that one of the great ocean steamships between New York City and European ports has a serious accident and when one does occur it creates a great deal of talk. In the rough weather of March the great Cunard steamer, Etruria, broke her shaft at sea and was towed to the Azores Islands, 700 miles and the poetries and the search of the course by a passing steamer. sea and was towed to the Azores Islands, 700 miles south of her course by a passing steamer. The Etruria's passengers were brought home from the Azores by a steamer sent out from New York, chartered for the purpose. The accident cost the Company half a million of dollars or more, $250,000 going to the lucky ship that picked the Etruria up. Captain Stevens of the Etruria is one of the oldest Captains of the line.

7. Thousands of the older people of this country remember the old time "nigger minstrel shows," and the names of the minstrels were known to all. Within the last few months were known to all. Within the last few months four of the best known of these have died (Billy" Emerson, "Billy" West, "Billy" Rice and Neil Bryant. When Billy Rice died in March, Bryant, then past seventy, said he would be the next to go and within a few days his prediction came true. He died at St. Mary's Hospital, New York.

8. Another American citizen has been honored by kingly recognition. This latest is John Anderson of The Skandinaren of Chicago, who has been created a Knight of St. Olaf, the only order in Norway, by King Oscar. Mr. Anderson was born in Norway in 1836 and came to this country in 1845.

9. Madame Nordica, one of our famous singers, is opposed to modern invention. She recently sang in a concert at Wichita, Kans., as she supposed to a Wichita audience, but the enterprising managers connected all the neighboring towns with the concert hall by telephone and Nordica sang to thousands and had no extra pay for it. She did not know about it until after the concert.

10. As Lord Pauncefote, British Ambassa-10. As Lord Pauncefote, British Ambassador to the United States, is soon to retire, there is considerable talk as to who will succeed him in his important office. The latest suggested successor is Hon. Alfred Lyttleton, eighth son of Lord Lyttleton. He is a bachelor of 45, a champion tennis player, a member of Parliament and has been on several government missions to South Africa. He is a nephew of the late Mrs. Gladstone, widow of the great Gladstone.

11. A youngster of fifteen who is creating some fuss in naval circles is George Molere, a grandnephew of William Hunt, Secretary of the Navy under President Garfield. Not withstanding the fact that he was born blind in one eye, he managed to pass all examinations after three trials, and is now on a two years' cruise, and his mother is trying to get him back home. He is a midshipman and in love with sea life.

• • • 12. When it was announced that Miss Alice Roosevelt, the President's daughter, would attend the coronation of King Edward in June, a great many American citizens had a great deal to say on the subject. So much indeed, that it has been decided that she shall not be there. Now there is almost as much talk should be there. there. Now there is almost as much talk about her not going, as no one at the White House will say why she has concluded not to go.

13. James M. Swift, a brother-in-law of the Republican director of New York politics, Senator Thomas C. Platt, died at his home in Tarrytown, N. Y., in March, in his eighty-third year. He had been postmaster of North Tarrytown for fifteen years, having been appointed first by President Cleveland. He used to sing in the church choir at Owego, N. Y., with Senator Platt, and it was agreed between them, that whenever they visited the old church each one was to put a five dollar gold piece into the contribution box, and the agreement was religiously observed.

14, 15. The condition of the health of King Leopold of Belgium is such that he may reach the end at any time, and his successor is coming into prominence. Prince Albert of Flanders, the heir to the Belgian throne, is a nephew of the King, and is a young man of studious habits and a great traveler. He visited the United States in 1898. He is twenty-seven years old. His wife was the Duchess Elizabeth of Bavaria. She is a woman of pleasing manners and very fond of outdoor sports.

. . . 16. The most eccentric merchant in the United States, Charles Broadway Rouss of New York, died there in March, aged 66, leaving an estate of several millions made as a dry goods merchant. It was his custom to pay his clerks merchant. It was his custom to pay his clerks one dollar a day, each, and payment was made every day. All his buying and selling were strictly for cash. During the last few years he was blind and he had a standing offer of a million dollars to any one who would restore his sight. He employed a man, whose sight was affected as his was, for the doctors to experiment on. He was a Virginian and was buried at Winchester in that state, where he had a mausoleum costing $40,000 and a monument costing $15,000 at his family lot.

17. A rumor was circulated recently to the effect that Count Leo Tolstoi, the famous Russian novelist and writer on economic subjects, had died in that country, and that the authorities would not permit the news to be sent out. Tolstoi, though rich, lived as a peasant, working in the fields and trying to set an example to the higher classes of the equality of man. In this country he would have been called a crank.

Much talk has been made in diplomatic circles of Europe over the story that King Alexander of Servia had agreed to sell his throne, and retire from business in favor of some substitute banished by Russia. The rumor added that he was urged to the transfer by Queen Draga. The King has denied the story in a formal announcement and says he will remain King and that he and his wife are in love with each other and will rule the country together. country together.

20. At the coronation of King Edward and his Queen, Alexandra will not be crowned by the same archbishop that crowns the King, who will be the Archbishop of Canterbury. The Archbishop of York will place the crown on the Queen's head.

21. The latest change President Roosevelt has made in his Cabinet is the substitution of Congressman W. H. Moody of Massachusetts for Hon. John D. Long, Secretary of the Navy, who was appointed by President McKinley. Secretary Moody was born in Haverhill, Mass. in 1853, is a lawyer, and been two terms in Congress. Mr. Long will retire from politics and practice law in Boston.

22. Much discussion has arisen over the court-martial of Major Littleton Waller of the Marine Corps, charged with atrocities upon Philippino prisoners. Major Waller's record in the war with Spain was of the very best and it is believed that if the charges against him were true that he was not in his right mind, owing to the sufferings undergone by him and his command in the island of Samar.

23, 24. Notwithstanding Lord Kitchener's announcement to the British Parliament that announcement to the British Parliament that the Boer war was practically over, the Boers in March inflicted upon the British forces under Gen. Lord Methuen one of the most disastrous defeats of the entire war. Lord Methuen was twice wounded and captured, many of his officers and men were killed and captured and all his trains taken. The victorious Boers were commanded by Gen. Delarey.

25. One of the victims of the Park Avenue Hotel fire in New York City was Mrs. Rebecca S. Foster, known as the "Tombs Angel." Mrs. Foster was a widow with means, and she devoted her time and her money to ministering to the needs of women and girls who were so unfortunate as to become inmates of New York's prison, called "The Tombs." 26, 27. No government scandal ever attracted wider attention than that of the conspiracy of Captain Oberlin M. Carter of the U. S. Army Engineer Corps and members of the Atlantic Contracting Company to defraud the government out of more than two million dollars in improvements of the harbor of Savannah and other ports in Georgia and Florida, and Captain Carter went to the penitentiary for his part in it. Recently Col. John I. Gaynor and B. D. Greene, well-known New Yorkers, suddenly left the city to prevent arrest on charges supposed to have been forgotten, and the scandal came out into the airagain. Carter's friends believe he is innocent. He spent large sums in high living, but his father-in-law is a rich man, and liberal. 26, 27. No government scandal ever attracted man, and liberal.

28. Society leaders have their troubles like the rest of human beings, and recently the Countess of Warwick, one of the grandest ladies of English society, was thrown from her horse while hunting in Essex, and was badly bruised and shaken up. As may be seen by her picture she is a handsome woman.

29, 30. There seems to be a general desire among all nations to bring about peace between Great Britain and the Boers, but Britain is stubborn and will listen only to unconditional surrender. Holland, being the closest nation to the Boers, recently sent her Prime Minister, Dr. Abram Kuyper, to London, on their behalf, but Lord Lansdowne, the British Foreign Minister, would not agree to propositions made, and the war still goes on. 31. ## The Oklahoma Detective,

The Strange Cabin in the Wilderness.

BY HENRY DALE.

Author of "Boomers and Cattle Kings," "The Cheyenne Outbreak," "Shadowing a Shadow," "Chepita," "Mormonism Unveiled," Etc.

The opening chapters of this intensely interesting story appeared in February Comfort. Back numbers may be obtained by enclosing three cents to Comfort, Augusta, Maine., for each number desired.

During the past year portions of Indian Territory were opened to settlement by the Government allotment of lots by chance, and the scenes that were enacted in the years gone by, when Oklahoma weas the objective point of settlers from east and west, north and south, were again presented in a much more exciting manner. A Kansas telephone girl lucki'y secured a lot valued at $17,000, and others were nearly as fortunate.

Because of the exciting events that have transpired in Oklahoma and Indian Territory, events that have attracted the attention of the whole country, the story of "Ned Todd" is presented to our readers in the hope that instruction and entertainment may be derived from its perusal.

CHAPTER X. IN THE TOILS.

Again, when the emergency demanded it, were the nerves of the youth like steel. He was even astonished at his own coolness. Some one touched his arm. It was Todd. Miss Miller was near enough for them to bring her to their little group by a simple motion of the head.

Some one touched his arm. It was Todd. Miss Miller was near enough for them to bring her to their little group by a simple motion of the head.

"Come," the detective faintly whispered. The jungle was very dark. There really seemed no avenue of escape, but all determined to make one gallant effort for liberty.

A faint rustling of the bushes and grass on the other side of the house was heard, and Todd knew that they dare not wait any longer. Their foes, knowing them to be armed and dangerous, were a little backward about making the attack, but there was no doubt that it would be made soon. It would now require all the courage and skill of India scouts, to creep through the bushes and tall grass, and escape from the line of foes that was being carefully drawn around them. Unfortunately for our friends, they had been compelled to leave their rifles behind them and had only their revolvers.

By the greatest caution and skill they got from the old house and began making their way southward. They came upon a spot that was almost barren of vegetation which had to be crossed or gone around. There was only an occasional bunch of grass growing upon the open spot, to conceal anyone that would attempt to cross it. After a few moments, the detective whispered:

"I must make the venture."

"I am ready," said Archie, at the same time casting an inquiring glance at Miss Miller. She interpreted the look and in a whisper assured them that she was ready to make any venture that they might deem necessary.

Todd went first, crawling on the ground and keeping close to the earth. Archie and Miss Miller followed close after him. He kept close to her, that he might defend her.

"Whist!" the detective said. Archie and Daisy crouched behind a clump of bushes, the youth holding a revolver in his hand.

Todd lifted his head above the grass to look about him. Suddenly a sharp report rang out on the night air, awakening the sleeping echoes and sending a whistling ball close to the head of the detective. Todd raised his revolver and pointed i man and did not dare risk a shot at random.

Again he dropped to the ground, and for a moment all three lay motionless.

Voices were heard talking in a low tone in the thicket, and the hurried tramp of feet could be heard in almost every direction.

"They are concentrating, Arch, we must make a dash for it," said Todd.

All three bounded to their feet and took to their heels.

"Crack, crack," rang out a pair of rifle shots, and though the bullets whistled uncomfortably near their heads, they escaped unhurt and reached the forest unhurt.

But the pursuit had now begun in earnest.

But the pursuit had now begun in earnest. The Oklahoma bandits were gathering from every direction and joining in the chase. The game had at last been started out and never vere fox hunters more determined to be in at "Halt, hold on, and we will give you quarter!" shouted one of the pursuers nearest them.

They were fleeing down a dark aisle in the forest, and the broken rays of moonlight sufficients, and the way for objects to be seen forest, and the broken rays of moonlight suffi-ciently lighted the way for objects to be seen some distance ahead. Archie and Daisy were before, and Major Todd following close after them. As they paid no attention to the com-mand, their pursuer fired at them, but the aim was too hasty to be accurate. The ball whis-tled harmlessly through the air, missing the mark by two feet.

"The scoundrels are having it too much their own way," said Todd, turning about, his re-volver in his hand.

Archie casta glance behind him, and through

Archie casta glance behind him, and through the whiff of smoke saw the foremost of his pur-suers drop his gun and fall upon his face, Not-withstanding the great distance, Todd had hit the mark.

"It will be a lesson," said the Major, as he ran close behind Archie and Miss Miller.
Wild yells of rage filled the air. Their pursuers grew desperate and begun firing at every opportunity that afforded itself. Having long range gans, and the fugitives being armed only with pistols, the contest was unequal.

Daisy grew faint, and Archie seized her in his arms and ran forward notwithstanding her protests and assertions that she could walk.

"You are not strong enough," he said.

"Then leave me. You can escape if you do not shamper yourself with me."

"I would die a thousand times rather than be guilty of such a cowardly act," he responded.

But it was evident the flight would be of short duration. The detective's dreaded revolver kept the human blood hounds at bay, but it was only temporarily.

Archie understood the situation, and realizathat a sacrifice must be made, said:

"or, we must separate. You are fresh take this girl and carry her, while word, may be the word, and they hang when we keton oo' our."

"I am not one of their men, and they hang when we keton oo' our."

Archie, with a revolver in each hand, wheeled about, and facing the foe opened a fire on them which checked their headway, until the detective and his precious burden were out of sight, and then turning off to the left drew the Oklahoma bandits after him down into a ravine and in quite a different direction from that taken by the detective and the maiden.

The pursuers were seven in number, when they had all got together. One had been killed by the detective's shot, and he was quite certain that he had disabled another.

"Stop! halt, ye scoundrel, or we'll bore ye through," yelled one of the pursuers, pressing close after the fugitive.

Archie turned about and fired shot with no effect, save to check the pursuer for a moment.

"I must be getting nervous," he thought

"He, he, he, he, he, he!" laughed the idiot, kicking and rolling and chuckling, as he held the sheepskin rug in his arms. The foremost guard at last administered a kick in his side, which monentarily silenced him.

"Snap's an idiot, he's a fool, an' he'd jest as soon eat ye up as not," said one of the guards.

Archie made no response, but suffered him-

BEFORE ANOTHER WORD COULD BE SPOKEN THREE OR FOUR DARK FORMS LEAPED OUT OF THE WOODS AND SEIZED THE HORSE BY THE BITS.

He ran at the top of his speed, but his strength seemed at last deserting him. His nerves had been so long strained that he realized that they could not hold out much longer. While flying down a rocky ravine with his pursuer close at his heels, he stumbled and fell. Before he could recover himself, they were on him. Wild, exultant yells filled the air, and Archie was quickly disarmed.

him. Wild, exultant yells filled the air, and Archie was quickly disarmed.

He expected each moment to be his last. The outlaws were furious at the loss of one of their number. They were a wild, ferocious set, and many of them, having the blood of the Indian in their veins, were little better than Indians. Never had he seen a wilder or more motley crowd. Some of them wore the slashed trousers and doublettes of the Mexican, and all attired in the frontier costume.

Their conversation was carried on part in English and part in Spanish, yet in such a wild, excited manner, that he could not understand any of it.

His hands were tied behind his back, and one of the outlaws raising him to his feet, said:
"Come on."

"Where'll we take him?" another asked.

"Come on."

"Where'll we take him?" another asked. These were the first words that he fully understood, the others were to him a hurried jumble of senseless jargon.

"To the house," the first speaker answered. Archie now discovered that but two men were with him, evidently a guard to take him to the house, while the others were going off in pursuit of his companions.

"You acted purty smart, youngster," said one of his guards. "Ye must a thought that ye war doin' suthin' smart, when ye went down inter the cellar and got the gal, but I guess the Cap'n will git her back. Ye war very brave, but it won't do yer any good. When Cap'n sets out to do anything, he does it, I guess."

"The night's a goin' away, an' we'll not git one wink o' sleep," said one of the guards.

"Yes."

"Why can't we sleep one at a time?"
The man addressed cast a longing look at the oor leading into the bed-room and said:

Tom swore at his ill luck and told Jack to go off to bed.

"Guess I'll git along some way," he growled.
"When'll the others come back?" asked Jack.
"When'll the other feller an' the "Soon ez they git the other feller an' the

"That's not likely tonight." "Did Bryce go with 'em?"

"An' thar's none o' the household up at this hour ter git a feller a drink o' liquor?"
"No."

hour ter git a feller a drink o' liquor?"

"No."

Jack rose to his feet again, and stretching his arms upward to their enormous length, yawned.

"Wall, good night, Tom," he said, as he went to the adjoining room, in which was a bed.

"Good night, and little good will all the sleep ye git this night do ye."

Jack laughed, but made no answer.

Tom was now alone with his prisoner. He leaned back in the large, old-fashioned recking chair and closed his eyes. He was almost asleep when a slight movement on the part of his prisoner caused him to awake, and snatching his pistol from its scabbard, he leveled it at Archie's head.

"Jist try it ef ye dare."

"I was not trying to get away," said Archie.

"Ye lie, ye know yer war atryin' ter git away from me," cried the angry guard.

"I am tied so tightly that my wrists are very painful, and I cannot sit long in one position."

"Wall, ye'll be quiet now, ef I hev ter shoot ye ter make ye do so."

Archie knew that it was useless for him to appeal to the wretch for mercy, and consequently he opened not his mouth.

The guard again closed his eyes, and in a few moments his regular breathing told that he was asleep.

moments his regular breathing told that he was asleep.

"If my hands and feet were free," the youthful prisoner thought, "I could soon escape from the wretches.

An hour passed, and the guard snored. The prisoner was in great pain, but so overcome by long days of fatigue and loss of sleep, that he was dozing, when he felt something touch his legs.

In a moment he was wide awake.

In a moment he was wide awake.

At his feet, crouching like some animal, was the mysterious, idiotic cripple. What was he doing? Bound as he was, the prisoner could not exactly see what he was about. But suddenly he felt his feet freed.

The idiot then raised himself to a crouching position, so that he could look into the face of the prisoner, and winked. Grotesque and distorted as those features were, there was something fine and noble and familiar about them. What was it?

The cripple calmly crept around to the rear and there remained for a moment. He could feel his hairy, scarred face against his wist and that he was gnawing the deerskin though that bound him.

In a few moments the captive's hands were freed, and the cripple gathering up the pieces of thongs put them in the prisoner's pocket, and crept noiselessly back to his rug and lay down to sleep. The prisoner could not but admire the cunning and courage of this remarkable cripple.

Who was he and what was there so strange.

of thongs put them in the prisoner's pockels, and crept noiselessly back to his rug and ly down to sleep. The prisoner could not but admire the cunning and courage of this remarkable cripple.

Who was he and what was there so strange about him? Often had he heard it whispeed when on the border, that there was a mystery in Oklahoma, which was beyond the power of man to solve. He had heard of a man there who was part animal and part human. Was this the Oklahoma mystery which had been magnified into such a fabulous description as was going all over the West?

When the cripple had reached his rug, he raised his head and pointed with his misshapen hand toward the door.

Archie Holland was not slow to follow his suggestion. He rose softly from the chair on which he was sitting and went to the door, which was bolted on the inside. Leaning against the wall by the side of the door was a rifle, which was outlined by the faintly smouldering fire. A belt containing two revolvers and a knife was hanging across the muzzle of the gun. When Archie reached the door, he paused with one hand on the butt of one of the pistols, and looked back at the sleeping guard. But his breathing was so heavy that there was no doubt of his being asleep, and there seemed but little danger of waking him.

He carefully raised the revolver belt and buckled it about his waist. It fitted exactly, and to his joy he recognized it as belonging to himself, and, thanking the fates and shrewd cripple who lay sleeping so innocently on the rug, the youth cautiously grasped the rifle, opened the door and walked out of the house.

Once more in open air, once more free. He seemed to regain some of his old strength with the thought. The moon was almost down, and by consulting his watch he discovered that the night was wellnigh spent.

Before he had gone a fourth of a mile be heard noises ahead of him, and coming to a halt listened.

"It's human voices," he said.

There was no mistake about it, for he could even hear some of the words that were spoken. "Well we'r him."

"It was Jack an' Tom's fault."

"It was Cap Snell's fault. What do he want to take prisoners fur anyway? Ez long ez we didn't we never hed any trouble. 'Dead men tell no tales' ye know, an' now this feller an' gal's got away an'll spread the news fur an' wide, until we hev a hull army o' soldiers an' detectives down on us."

"Maybe we'll git 'em vit."

"Maybe we'll git 'em yit."
"No, we won't."
"Why?"

"Cos I know they'll not be cotched."
"But Cap an' some o' 'em are still out, an' as soon as it's daylight which won't be very long off neither, they'll git on their trail."
"Yes but the fools went off without a single hoss, and what's a man goin' ter do a foot?"
"Haint the others afoot an' won't we be back in time to help. 'em out with the hosses?"

in time to help 'em out with the hosses?"
"I think it's doubtful. Didn't Jack an' Tom stay behind to guard that other prisoner?"
"Yee"

"Yes."

"Like ez not they'll let him git away."

"Ha, ha, ha! Dyke, yer out o' humor ionight!"

They had passed the fugitive, and were now so far away that their voices could be no longer heard. It was with no little degree of satisfaction, that Archie Holland heard the above conversation. It was very evident that the detection of the same satisfaction of the same satisfaction.

CHAPTER V.

DODGER.

The boy sprang to the side of Florence and seized her wrists in his strong young grasp.
"Don't you alarm the house." he said, "or I'll—"
"What will you do?" gasped Florence, in alarm.
The boy was evidently softened by her beauty, and answered in a tone of hesitation:
"I don't know. I won't harm you if you keep quiet."

"I don't know. I won't harm you if you keep quiet."

"What are you here for?" asked Florence, fixing her eyes on the boy's face. "Are you a thief?"

"I don't know—yes, I suppose I am."

"How sad, when you are so young."

"What! miss, do you pity me?"

"Yes, my poor boy; you must be very poor or you wouldn't bring yourself to steal."

"No. I ain't poor; leastways, I have enough to eat and I have a place to sleep."

"Then why don't you earn your living honestly?"

"I can't; I must obey orders."

"Whose orders?"

"Who, the guy'nor's, to be sure."

"Why, the guv'nor's, to be sure."
"Did he tell you to open that secretary?"

"Yes."
"Who is the guv'nor, as you call him?"
"I can't tell; it wouldn't be square."
"He must be a very wicked man."
"Well, he ain't exactly what you call an angel, but I've seen wuss men than the guv'nor."
"Do you mind telling me your own name?"
"No; for I know you won't peach on me. Tom Dodger."

Dodger."
"Dodger?"

Dodger."
"Dodger?"
"Yes."
"That isn't a surname."
"It's all I've got. That's what I'm always called."
"It is very singular," said Florence, fixing a glance of mingled curiosity and perplexity upon the young visitor.
While the two were earnestly conversing in that subdued light afforded by the lowered gaslight, Tim Bolton crept in through the door unobserved by either, tip-toed across the room to the secretary, snatched the will and a roll of bills and escaped, still without attracting attention.
"Oh, I wish I could persuade you to give up this bad life, and become honest."
"Do you really care what becomes of me, miss?"
"I do, indeed."
"That's very kind of you, miss; but I don't understand it. You are a rich young lady and I'm only a poor boy, livin' in a Bowery dive."
"What's that?"
"Never mind, miss, such as you wouldn't understand.

"That's very kind of you, miss, such that the that it. You are a rich young lady and I'm only a poor boy, livin' in a Bowery dive."

"What's that?"

"Never mind, miss, such as you wouldn't understand. Why, all my life I've lived with thieves and drunkards and bunco men and—"

"But I'm sure you don't like it. You are fit for something better."

"Do you really think so?"

"Yes; you have a good face. You were meant to be good and honest, I am sure."

"Would you trust me?" asked the boy, fixing his large dark eyes eloquently on the face of Florence.

"Yes, I would if you would only leave your evil companions and become true to your better nature."

"No one ever spoke to me like that before, miss," said Dodger, his expressive features showing that he was strongly moved. "You think I could be good if I tried hard, and grow up respectable?"

"I am sure you could," said Florence, confidently. There was something in this boy, young outlaw though he was, that moved her powerfully, and even fascinated her, though she hardly realized it. "I could if I was rich like you and lived in a nice house, and 'sociated with swells. If you had a father like mine—"

"Is he a bad man?"

"Well, he don't belong to the church. He keeps a gin-mill, and has ever since I was a kid."

"Yes; but not in New York."

"Have you always lived with him?"

"Yes, miss."

"And you have always had this man as guardian?"

"You've got a different father from me, miss?"

Tears forced themselves to the eyes of Florence as this remark brought forcibly to her mind the position in which she was placed.

"Alas! I am alone in the world."

"What! ain't the old gentleman that lives here your father?"

"He is my uncle; but he is very, very angry with me, and has ordered me to leave the house."

"When, and has ordered me to leave the house."

"When, and has ordered me to leave the house."

Florence Linden left her luxurious home knowing not what awaited her. She like Dodger was adrift in New York. "Mas! ain't the old gentleman that lives here your father?"

"He is my uncle; but he is very, very angry with me, and has ordered me to leave the house."

"Why, what a cantankerous old ruffian he is to be sure!" exclaimed the boy, indignantly.

"Hush! you must not talk against my uncle. He has always been kind to me till now."

"Why, what's up? What's he mad about?"

"He wants me to marry my cousin Curtis, a man I do not even like."

"That's a shame! Is it the dude! saw come out of the house a little while ago?"

"Oh, no; that's a different gentleman. It's Mr. de Brabazon."

"You don't want to marry him do you?"

"No, no!"

"I'm glad of that. He don't look as if he knew enough to come in when it rained."

"The poor young man is not very brilliant, but I would rather marry him than Curtis Waring." what awaited her. She like Dodger was adrift in New York.

spoke to him."

"You stand by him, you shameless girl! I blush to think that you are my niece. I am gilad to think that my eyes are opened before it is too late." The old merchant rung the bell violently, Dodger made no attempt to escape, but stood beside Florence in the attitude of a protector. But a short time elapsed before Curtis Waring and the servants entered the room, and gazed with wonder at the excited old man and the two young people.

"My friends," said John Linden, "I call you to witness that this girl, whom I blush to acknowledge as my niece, has proved herself unworthy of my kindness. In your presence I cut her off, and bid her never again darken my door."

"But what has she done, uncle?" asked Curtis. He was prepared for the presence of Dodger, whom he rightly concluded to be an agent of Tim Bolton, but he could not understand why Florence should be in the library at this late hour. Nor was he able to understand the evidently friendly relations between her and the young visitor.

"What has she done?" repeated John Linden. "She has introduced that young ruffian into the house to rob me. Look at that secretary! He has forced it open, and stolen a large sum of money."

"It is not true, sir," said Dodger, calmly—"about taking the money, I mean. I haven't taken a cent."

"Then why did you open the secretary! He has forced it open, and stolen a large sum of money."

"It is not true, sir," said Dodger, calmly—"about taking the money, I mean. I haven't taken a cent."

"Then why did you open the secretary! We has forced it open, and stolen a large sum of money."

"It is not true, sir," said Dodger, sollmly—"about taking the money, I mean. I haven't taken a cent."

"Then why did you open the secretary! We has forced the money is gone?"

"He hasn't discovered about the will," thought Curtis, congratulating himself. "If the boy has it, I must manage to give him a chance to escape."

"You can search me if you want to," continued Dodger, proudly. "You

"The poor young man is not very brilliant, but I would rather marry him than Curtis Waring."

"I've seen him, too. He's got dark hair and a dark complexion, and a wicked look in his eyes."

"You, too, have noticed that?"

"I've seen such as him before. He's a bad man."

"Do you know anything against him?" asked Florence, eagerly.

"Only his looks."

"I am not deceived," murmured Florence. "It's not wholly prejudice. The boy distrusts him, too. So you see, Dodger," she added, aloud. "I am not a rich young lady, as you suppose. I must leave this house, and work for my living. I have no home any more."

"If you have no home, come home with me."

"To the home you have described, my poor boy? How could I do that?"

"No; I will hire a room for you in a quiet street, and you shall be my sister. I will work for you, and give you my money."

"You are kind, and I am glad to think I have found a friend when I need one most. But I could not accept stolen money. It would be as bad as if I, too, were a thief."

"But I am not a thief! That is, I won't be any more."

"And you will give up your plan of robbing my

"And you will give up your plan of robbing my uncle?"

"Yes, I will, though I don't know what my guv'nor will say. He'll half murder me, I guess. He'll be sure to cut up rough."

"Do right, Dodger, whatever happens. Promise me that you never will steal again?"

"There's my hand, miss—I promise. Nobody ever talked to me like you. I never thought much about bein' respectable, and growin'up to be somebody, but if you take an interest in me I'll try hard to do right."

At this moment Mr. Linden, clad in a long morning-gown, and holding a candle in his hand, entered the room and started in astonishment when he saw Florence clasping the hand of one Curtis Waring beckoned Dodger into an adjoining room.

"Now, my boy," he said, smoothly. "give me what you took from the secretary, and I will see that you are not arrested."

"But, sir, I didn't take nothing—it's just as I told the old duffer. The girl waked up just as I'd got the secretary open, and I didn't have a chance."

"But the money is gone," said Curtis, in an incredulous tone.

"I don't know nothing about that."

"Come, you'd better examine your pockets. In the hurry of the moment you may have taken it without knowing it."

rough.
"Shameless girl!" he exclaimed, in stern reproof.
"So this is the company you keep when you think I am out of the way!"

CHAPTER VI. A TEMPEST.

The charge was so strange and unexpected that Florence was overwhelmed. She could only murmur:
"Oh, uncle!"

"No. I don't want to get him into trouble, or you get he felt that Florence had consented to accept him as a friend, and he was resolved to stand by her. "I say, old man," he bristled up, "don't you go to insult her! She's an angel."

"No doubt you think so," rejoined Mr. Linden, in a tone of sarcasm. "Upon my word, miss, I congratulate you on your elevated taste. So this is your reason for not being willing to marry your cousin Curtis?"

"Indeed, uncle, you are mistaken. I never met this boy till tonight."

"On't try to deceive me. Young man, did you open my secretary?"

"Yes, sir."

"And robbed it into the bargain," continued Linden, going to the secretary and examining it. He did not, however, miss the will, but only the roll of bills. "Give me back the money you have taken from it, you young rascal!"

"I thought you would be living with some such man. Did he come to the house with you tonight?"

"Yes."

"Where is he?"

"Her young companion was indignant. Already him and I will be your friend."

"You're a better sort than I thought at first," said Dodger. "The man I live with is called Tim Bolton."

"I thought so," quickly ejaculated Curtis. He had searcely got out the words before he was sensible that he made a mistake.

"What, do you know Tim?" inquired Dodger, in surprise.

"I mean," replied Curtis, lamely, "that I had heard of this man Bolton. He keeps a saloon on the Bowery, doesn't he?"

"Yes."

"I thought you would be living with some such man. Did he come to the house with you tonight?"

"He stayed outside."

"Do you think I am a fool, you young burglar?" exclaimed John Linden, angrily.
"Uncle, let me speak to the boy," said Curtis, soothingly. "I think he will tell me."
"As you like, Curtis; but I am convinced that he is a thief."

Curtis Waring beckoned Dodger into an adjoin

"With my father. Leastways, he says he's my father."

There was a growing suspicion in the mind of Curtis Waring. He scanned the boy's features with attention. Could this ill-dressed boy be his long-lost and deeply-wronged cousin?

"Who is it that says he is your father?" he demanded, abruptly.

"Do you want to get him into trouble?"

"No. I don't want to get him into trouble, or you either. Better tell me all, and I will be your friend."

"You're a better sort than I thought at first," said

"And you took nothing?"

"No."

"It seems very strange. I cannot understand it.

Yet my uncle says the money is gone. Did anyone else enter the room while you were talking with Miss Linden?"

"I didn't see anyone."

"What were you talking about?"

"She said the old man wanted her to marry you, and she didn't want to."

"She told you that?" exclaimed Curtis, in displeasure.

"She told you that?" exclaimed Curtis, in displeasure.

"Yes, she did. She said she'd rather marry the dude that was here early this evenin'."

"Mr. de Brabazon!"

"Yes,that's the name."

"Upon my word, she was very confidential. You are a queer person for her to select as a confidant."

"Maybe so, sir; but she knows I'm her friend."

"You like the young lady, then? Perhaps you would like to marry her yourself?"

"As if she'd taken any notice of a poor boy like me. I told her if her uncle sent her away, I'd take care of her and be a brother to her."

"How would Mr. Tim Bolton like that?"

"I wouldn't take her to where he lives."

"I think, myself, it would hardly be a suitable home for a young lady brought up on Madison avenue. There is certainly no accounting for tastes. Miss Florence——"

"That's her name, is it?"

"Yes; didn't she tell you?"

"No; but it's a nice name."

"She declines my hand, and accepts your protection. It will certainly be a proud distinction to become Mrs. Dodger."

"Don't you laugh at her!" said Dodger, suspiciously.

She has even confided to him her dislike for me, and he has offered her his protection."
"Is this so, miss?" demanded Mr. Linden, stern-

"Yes, uncle," faltered Florence.
"Then you can join the young person you have selected whenever you please. For your sake I will not have him arrested for attempted burglary. He is welcome to what he has taken, since he is likely to marry into the family. You may stay here tonight, and he can call for you in the morning."

John Linden closed the secretary and left the room, leaving Florence sobbing. The servants, too, retired, and Curtis was left alone with her.
"Florence," he said, "accept my hand, and I will reconcile my uncle to you. Say but the word, and "I can never speak it, Curtis! I will take my uncle at his word. Dodger, call for me tomorrow at eight, and I will accept your friendly services in finding me a new home."

"I'll be on hand, miss. Good-night!"
"Be it so, obstinate girl!" said Curtis, angrily.
"The time will come when you will bitterly repent your mad decision."

CHAPTER VII. FLORENCE LEAVES HOME.

Florence passed a sleepless night. It had come upon her so suddenly, this expulsion from the home of her childhood, that she could not fully realize it. She could not feel that she was taking her last look at the familiar room, and well-remembered dining-room. She was alone at the breakfast table, for the usual breakfast hour was halfpast eight, and she had appointed Dodger to cali for her at eight.

"Is it true, Miss Florence, that you're going away?" asked Jane, as she waited upon Florence.

"Yes, Jane," answered Florence, sadly.

"It's a shame, so it is! I didn't think your uncle would be so hard-hearted."

"He is disappointed because I won't marry my cousin Curtis."

"I don't blame you for it, miss. I never liked Mr. Waring. He isn't half good enough for you."

"I don't blame you for it, miss. I never liked Mr. Waring. He isn't half good enough for you."

"I don't blame you for it, miss. I never liked Mr. Waring. He isn't half good enough for you."

"I say nothing about that, Jane; but I will not marry a man I don't love."

"Nor would I, miss. Where are you going?"

"I don't know, "said Florence, despondently.

"But you can't walk about the streets."

"A trusty friend is going to call for me at eight o'clock; when he comes admit him."

"It is a young gentleman?"

"You wouldn't call him such. He is a boy, a poor boy; but I think he is a true friend. He says he will find me a comfortable room somewhere, where I can settle down and look for work."

"Are you going to work for a living, Miss Florence?" asked Jane, horrified.

"I must, Jane."

"It's a great shame—you, a lady born."

"No, I do not look upon it in that light. I shall be happier having my mind and hands occupied."

"Who, inss?"

"I's a great shame—you alady born."

"No, I do not look upon it in that light. I shall be happier having my mind and hands occupied."

"Who is he?"

"It's the boy I spoke of."

"Shure, he's got a quare name."

"Yes; but names don't count for much. It's the heart I think of, and this boy has a kind heart."

"Have you known him long?"

"I saw him yesterday for the first time."

"Is it the young fellow who was here last night?"

"Yes."

"He isn't fit company for the likes of you."

"If you are poor, Miss Florence," said Jane, and I don't need it at all."

"Thank you. Jane," said Florence, gratefully. "I

"But, miss, twenty dollars will soon go," said Jane disappointed.
"If I find that I need the sum you so kindly offer me, I will let you know, I promise that."
"Thank you, miss."
At this point the bell rung from above.
"It's from Mr. Curtis's room," said Jane.
"Go and see what he wants."
Jane returned with a note in her hand.
"Mr. Curtis asked me if you were still here," she explained, "and when I told him you were he asked me to give you this."
Florence—Now that you have had time to think over your plan of leaving your old home, I hope you have come to see how foolish it is. "Maybe there is, and maybe there isn't, Miss Florence. If I ever do get married, I'll invite you to the wedding."

"And I'll promise to come if I can. But I hear the bell. I think my friend Dodger has come."

"Shall I ask him in, miss?"

"No. Tell him I will be ready at once."

"She went out into the hall, and when the door was opened the visitor proved to be Dodger. He had improved his appearance so far as his limited means would allow. His hands and face were thoroughly clean; he had bought a new collar and necktie; his shoes were polished, and despite his shabby suit, he looked quite respectable. Getting a full view of him, Florence saw that his face was frank and handsome, his eyes bright and his teeth like pearls.

"I will," answered Dodger, heartily. "Come, Miss Florence, if you don't mind walking over to Fourth avenue, we'll take the horse cars."

Among the flowers which will do this the following deserve Marigolds, Zinnias, Balsams, Scabiosa, Nasturtiums and Morning Giories. All are good. All will grow well in almost any kind of garden soil. None of them require anything but the most ordinary care. Have the soil in which their seed is sowed fine and mellow. Cover it lightly and press the covering down with a smooth board to make the soil firm enough to retain moisture until germination takes place, and the roots of the seedlings can reach down into the ground after nutriment. As soon as the plants are large enough to enable you to tell the difference between them and weeds, go over the beds and clean them out, and make it a point, from that time on, during the remainder of the season, to never allow a weed to more than show its head before you wage warfare on it. You cannot grow good flowers and weeds in the same beds. The weeds will take the lion's share of everything if you allow them to do so. All of the plants named, with the exception of the Aster, will begin to bloom by the middle or last of June, and by midsummer they will be in their prime. To keep them producing flowers, cut off the old blossoms as soon as they fade. If this is not done they will form seed, and if you allow them to do this the energies of the plant will be thrown into the work, and thereafter flowers will be few and far between with most of them.

I discover that I have omitted two of the most desirable kinds—Phlox and Petunias. These deserve a place in every garden. They are wonderfully profuse bloomers, and, if prevented from seeding they will bloom until frost comes.

A PRETTY CIRCULAR BED.

Not ail the pretty beds are to be found on the grounds of wealthy people, or among the professional gardeners. One of the loveliest combinations of color I have ever seen was made by using three colors of Phlox, rose-color, pure white, and pale yellow. In the center of the bed—which was circular, and about eight feet across—a Rose Geranium, which had grown to be too large for the window, was planted. About it was a row of rose-colored Phlox, then one of pale yellow, then another of rose-color, and the bed was edged with the pure white variety. The harmony of color, from the green of the Rose Geranium down was very pleasing. The only extma care demanded by such a bed is that of going over the rows two or three times a week, and trimming off the branches of each color which seem inclined to reach over the line into the neighboring color. This can be easily done with clippers or shears, and it is necessary that it should be done if you want the color in each row to show solidly, and without a ragged edge. Allow the plants of different color to blend with each other and the effect aimed at is lost after a little. Shear each kind back sharply to the limit assigned it, and do this often enough to keep each color entirely by itself.

A FLORAL SALAMANDAR.

A FLORAL SALAMANDAR.

If there is a hot, sunshiny place in your garden where nothing likes to grow because of the too intense heat which characterizes the place, try the Portulacca there. This little low-growing, half-creeping flower will stand more heat than anything else I know of in the list of the annuals. It seems to take an intense delight in the hottest sunshine, and day after day it will unfold its brilliant flowers in wonderful profusion, and make the spot where it grows one of the gayest in the garden. It comes in all shades of red, rose, crimson, yellow, and pure white. Of late years the florists have succeeded in producing double flowers which are quite like miniature roses. These are much finer than the single varieties. About twenty per cent. of the plants from an ordinary package of seed will produce double flowers, as a general thing. This plant is an excellent one for low beds, near the path, or close to the house, because of its low, spreading habit.

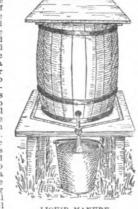

PANSIES.

Every woman who loves flowers will want some of these in her garden. But she will be quite likely to be disappointed with them during the summer, as they will give but few flowers as a general thing, and these not at all like the large and briliantly colored blossoms she had been led to expect from the description in the catalogues. The fact is the Pansy is not a good summer bloomer. It is not a good summer bloomer.

spring-sown plants are at their best. Therefore, during the hot weather of July and August do not allow your plants to bloom. Hold them in reserve for a season that suits them better, by picking off every bud that appears. About the first of August go over all the plants and cut back each branch at least two-thirds its length. This will cause the plants to produce new branches, and by the first of September they will have renewed themselves to such an extent that you have a lot of strong, vigorous plants in excellent condition for doing good work during the rest of the fall. They should be fertilized well along about the first of September, by digging in old rotted manure from the cow yard about each plant. Or, if you prefer, a liquid manure can be used instead. Pansies for early spring flowering must be grown from seedlings started the preceding fall, or from plants procured from florists who get them under way very early in the season.

LIQUID MANURE.

the preceding fall, or from plants procured from florists who get them under way very early in the season.

LIQUID MANURE.

The woman who lives on a small country place or farm has many advantages over the woman who lives in village or city, in the way of flower-growing. One of these advantages is the facility with which she can perpare fertilizers for her flowers. An ideal fertilizer can be made by filling an old barrel with cow-manure, and leaching it. Pound the manure down well, when it is put in the barrel. Before doing this, make a small hole at the front part of the bottom of the barrel, for the liquid to r u n off through the give it a firm support, and cut a little channel in it from each side of the barrel to a point at the edge, for the manure-water to runin. This concentrates it, and makes it an easy matter to catch it in a pail slipped under the board up on which the barrel stands. Without the e se grooves or channels in the bottom-board the liquid is likely to run all over it, and a good deal may be lost. After pounding down the material with which the barrel stands. Without the barrel showly for a time. This is to allow the application to soak through the entire mass of manure before leaching begins. As soon as it appears to be well wet through, apply more, and in a short time you will see a dark brown fluid escaping at the opening in the bottom of the barrel. Then put on water liberally. Liquid manure should be about the color of weak table tea, when applied to plants. Never use it when dark colored, as it is too strong, in that condition. Dilute it until you have it of the right color, than apply liberally to each plant that requires it. It will be readily assimilated by the plants, and they will soon take on a rich green color, and make vigorous growth. This is the kind of liquid manure to use on house plants if you want a strong and healthy growth, and large, fine flowers from them. But be careful in the use of it on potplants in the open ground it can be used more freely without any risk of i

A NOTE TO MY READERS.

A NOTE TO MY READERS.

It is the intention of the publisher to have this department practical and useful in all ways. It will deal with the matter of gardening, both out and indoors, in a way calculated to be helpful to the woman who can have but a small garden, or a few pot-plants. In order to make it of the greatest possible benefit to these women who love flowers quite as well as those do who have a great deal of time to devote to their culture, the editor of the department will undertake to answer all questions they may ask, to the best of his ability. If there is anything you want to find out about flowers, tell me what it is, and perhaps I can furnish you with the desired information. Any way, I will do my best to do so, and as your questions will be answered through these columns they will be of interest to all "Comfort" readers. Address Eben E. CHAPTER I.

CHAPTER I.

On a summer morning in the early period of the Revolution, the family of Mr. Edward Elsworth, consisting of four persons, were assembled at the breakfast meal. Opposite, a little withdrawn from the table, sat Mr. Elsworth, with an open letter spread upon his knee.

Mr. Elsworth was a retired merchant, who, failing in London, had come to America with his family of two daughters and a sister.

The two daughters were Rose and Kate.
Rose is my heroine. She was young and beautiful, wise and witty too, as I shall prove to you. Kate was a little, playful, mischievous, bewitching creature with dancing eyes and the merriest laugh in the world.

One member of the family was absent—Lieut. Harry Elsworth, the oldest child, a graduate of Oxford, and a promising young officer in the king's service.

Mr. Edward Elsworth was courtly, polished, punctilious, fastidious and a thorough royalist.

in the king's service.

Mr. Edward Elsworth was courtly, polished, punctilious, fastidious and a thorough royalist. His manners were elaborate, his costume careful and scrupulously exact. The society of his family supplied his social wants; and as his neighbors were nearly all confessedly uncultivated, he very rarely exchanged courtesies with them. Thus withdrawn from the noisy highways of the world, the Revolution broke upon him like a thunderclap. He could neither uncarstand it, nor appreciate it. A sound churchman, and full of chivalrous loyalty, he looked upon the Revolution with uncompromising bitterness and hostility.

"Very extraordinary news!" said Mr. Elsworth, taking up the letter from his knee for the tenth time.

Everybody was on the alert, strange rumors were rife, and anything like authentic intelligence, in times of so much emotion and trouble, was eagerly welcomed.

"There has been a battle."

"Good gracious!" broke simultaneously from three pairs of lips.

"On Long Island."

"Is it possible!" replied Miss Sarah Elsworth, this time having it all to herself.

Mr. Elsworth read—Washington had been defeated—had evacuated the city—was retiring northward.

northward.
"I feel," said he, "that our situation is becoming here unsafe. We are continually exposed to the assaults of marauders. It would It would be wiser in the present aspect of affairs, for us to seek a securer residence in New York, now so fortunately in possession of Sir William

Miss Elsworth hastened to sanction the proposal.

"I should prefer remaining here," said Rose.

"Is it safe, Rose?" said Mr. Elsworth.

"Yes," was the reply; "quite safe, for we neutralize each other. Your loyalty will secure you with the tories, and my whiggism will protect us with the other faction."

"Your whiggism, Rose! You shock me by your avowal of principles so infamous. And your brother, too, an officer of the king."

"The more need of my being a whig, or else the roof might be burned over our heads."

"I don't think there's much danger of that," broke in Kate, with a look of demure mischief; "if Mr. Armstrong is here to protect us."

"Mr. Armstrong!" said Mr. Elsworth, turning to Kate inquiringly.

"Oh, yes, papa," said Kate, refusing to be silenced by Rose's significent look; "he's got to be a captain."

"Not a rebel, Ltrust."

"Not a rebel, 1-trust."
"Not a traitor, I thank Heaven!" said Rose with a flushed cheek.
"You confound terms strangely," remarked her father; "a traitor is one false to his king," "False to his country—I read it. A king is a creature of today—your country a thing of im.
mortality."

"False to his country—I read it. A king is a creature of today—your country a thing of immortality."

"Then, sir, serve the Stuarts. How came the house of Hanover upon the throne?"

Mr. Elsworth looked confused and was silent.
"You see, sir," said Rose, "that if your zealous loyalists could shift off James, we, with less belief in the divine rights of kings, can shift off George."

At this moment there was a knock at the door—presently a step in the hall, and then the entrance of a rather singular looking personage, who was immediately addressed by the whole group as Mr. Metcalf.
"Have you very late news of the war, Mr. Metcalf?" inquired Mr. Elsworth, after the visitor had accepted the seat offered him.
"News—plenty of it, and mad. The country is depopulated. There isn't a youth with the first hope of a beard upon his chin, who hasn't gone with young Armstrong to join the army."
"Young Armstrong?"

"To be sure, sir. He's turned out a fiery whole for all. and a very table earlier to be the weard of the real and a very table earlier to be the seat of the real.

"Young Armstrong?"

"To be sure, sir. He's turned out a fier rebel after all—and a veritable captain to boot."

"Why, what do you mean, Mr. Metcalf?
What does he mean, Rose?"

"Walter, father, has gone to join Washington—and he is a captain by virtue of some service rendered Congress."

"Heaven bless me!" said Mr. Elsworth, rising, and beginning to walk the floor in agitation, "this is very sad. A promising youth to be led astray! Dear me, dear me! Rose, I am very sorry to say that this is certainly your fault. You have filled him with your wild, radical, and absurd heroic rhapsodies. You have made him disloyal to his king. You have radical, and absurd heroic rhapsodies. You have made him disloyal to his king. You have put a dagger in his hand to stab at the heart of his country. Alas! I see what the end will be—disgrace and death, ignominy and the gallows."

Rose made no reply to this, but walked to disgrace and death, ignominy and the gallows."

Rose made no reply to this, but walked to the window.

Walter Armstrong and his mother were the only neighbors with whom Mr. Elsworth's family had established any familiar acquaintance. Between Harry Elsworth and Walter Armstrong a close friendship had sprung up, which was the first means of introducing Walter into Mr. Elsworth's family. Intelligent and cultivated much above his neighbors, generous, frank, and abounding with genial and hearty humor, he soon became everybody's favorite, and very naturally between Rose and him, the idle little god, which plays such antics with us all, set mischief.

But the war came, and suddenly a gulf reled between Walter and his friends. Walter's sympathies from the first were warmly enlisted in favor of the whigs, but he trembled at the thought that such an avowal would but too surely wreck all his hope of Rose Elsworth's love. He had not courage to make that avowal, and, therefore, cherished his principles in secret. His inactivity and apparent neutrality exposed him to the taunts of the villagers. High-souled and fiery, this was more than be could bear. He planned and executed a brilliant exploit, which gained him an audience with Washington, and an offer of whatever reward he would accept. He begged for a commission. It was granted. He flew back to his native place, and gathered together as speedily as possible a rough, uncouth, but true-hearted company of followers.

It was now necessary to reveal his principles to Rose. To his delight and astonishment, he discovered that she was at heart thoroughly whig, and had watched his period of inaction with pain. High-spirited and heroic, these were her words:

'I should be happier, Walter, with the consciousness of your duty done, even if the consequence were your untimely death, than to see you live covered with many years and no honors.''

The Cinnamon Vine-from the Oriental land, is one of The Cinnamon Vine—from the Oriental land, is one of the most charming of climbers, and will quickly surround your arbor, window or veranda with a wonderful profusion of vines covered with handsome, glossy, heart-shaped leaves and sweet-scented flowers, making it a perfect bower of beauty. PERFECTLY HARDY—thriving everywhere, and once planted will grow for many years, and be a source of constant delight to the possessor. The vines often run year and a source of the constant delight when trained over and about a window a veranda is universally admired, while its many clusters of delicate, unique white flowers, send out an amount of delicots fragrance that is as truly wonderful as it is indescribable.

NO PERSON of refinement and taste should fall to plant these lovely vines. No home is complete without them. They stand the hardest winter without injury, and burst forthin all their marvelous splendor very early in the spring—as face a climber as any lover of beautiful flowers can wish. (Plant any time up to June 15.)

CINNAMON VINES may also be grown indoors in winter, and make one of the most attractive of window climbers.

Make Home Beautiful. There is nothing will gire a cosy appearance, or is a surer index of refinement and culture than these ornamental, fragrant vines twining and climbing about the porch, windows and trelliese. They are God's own natural drapery, from the Oriental land where graceful beauty is most highly prized.

Practical Electricity.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY H. EDWARD SWIFT.

HE last paper left off at a point where we found if a coil of wire was involved between the poles of a horse shoe magnet a current of electricity was de-velope d. It is a known fact that every piece of iron possesses about 110 volts, if a larger plant 220 volts is about 110 volts, if a larger plant 220 volts is devel oped and strengthened. A piece of soft iron, either round, square or oblong in section is wound with many turns of insulated copper wire, in such a manner that were an electrical current sent along the wire, the iron would be strongly magnetized, north at one extremity and south at the other. To the ends of this magnet is a hout 120 volts and a volt at a line with the spindle on which is tates and are fastened down currents are sure we shall find that the zinc is at once acted upon by the acid being rapidly corroded and of bubbles of gold the voltage of the same time a quantity of bubbles of gold the voltage of the v at C, Fig. 1. Two or more ends are brought out at a line with the spindle on which it rotates and are fastened down to two or more curved sections of a brass cylinder placed round the circumference and insulated from the spin-dle. Two flat metallic springs connected to binding screws which form the tunnels of the machine E E, Fig. 1, serve to collect the elec-tricity started by the rotation of the cylinder

C within the field magnets A A, Fig. 1. This cylinder is called the armature.

Revolving the armature between two poles of a magnet produces a current of electricity in the armature and the current passing through the wire to the segments or sections shown in the center of the cylinder C, passes through the branches and along the wire of the magnet B, making it powerfully magnetic. This in turn acts on the armature in motion until the limit of electrical production for each individual machine is reached. The current is then directed to the outside or working current to be used as required. High tension currents are used for short distances. The usual current show and the jar filled with water. There are many forms of battery but all are built on the same general principle. Certain combinations of chemicals in connection with the zinc and carbon commonly used, will make a stronger and more efficient battery than this. These are sold under various names, but when it comes to steady persistent work nothing will stand up to the old crowfoot single solution battery so extensively used in telegraph work. This for motors is especially good,— the only care required is to use them enough so they will not get foul and allow the solution to crystal. not get foul, and allow the solution to crystalize.

In his daughter's, it was the greatest glory. Miss Elsworth, perceiving Rose's unpleasant position by this discussion, attempted to direct the conversation into another channel.

"Mr. Metcalf," said she, "how are your little charges?"

The gentleman was the village teacher.

"Caught the spirit of rebellion, marm, and as untractable as bulls. Bless you, there isn't a lad over fourteen who hasn't abandoned his horn-book and gone off with Armstrong. And as for the girls they are greater rebels than the boys. What do you think, marm? The other day they came marching in procession, and demanded to know on what side I was. I said 'God save the King,' whereupon they all fell upon me like a swarm of bees, armed with a thousand pins, and so pinched and pricked and pulled me so there wasn't a square inch of my skin that wasn't as full of holes as a tenyear-old pin-cushion. And I do believe they never would have stopped if I hadn't cried, 'Huzza for Washington!'"

"Never a bit, sir!" Mr. Metcalf was an Irishman, with only an occasional touch of the brogue. "I content myself with teaching the young idea how to shoot, without indulging in such dangerous practices myself."

Rose managed to escape from the room. She saw very well that storm and contention were to shatter the peace of the household—that between her father and herself were to arise difference, opposition, and perhaps, estrangement.

"Oh, thank you, marm."
"I shall know where to find you when I have any message to send."
"At the sign of the birch, marm. Whenever you hear a score of throats shrieking all together at the top of the scale you will know at once that that's the Babel where I preside," and he backed himself off the piazza upon the law.

He had been gone only a few minutes, when Kate came running up, exclaiming:
"Papa would like to see you, Rose, in the library"

"I saw him enter."

CHAPTER II.

Rose found her father in the library, awaiting her approach. She went over to him, and seated herself on a low stool.

"You sent for me, sir. I think I know what you are going to say."
"In that case, Rose, I hope that you have come here prepared to yield obedience."
"Impose no commands on me, sir, I beseech you. You yourself must admit that my obedience to you has always been rendered cheeryou. You yourself must admit that my obedi-ence to you has always been rendered cheer-fully and to the letter. I could wish that it should always be so. But there is one matter on which I cannot prove false to my judgment, my heart, or to that consciousness of duty within me."

Rose, answer me plainly, are you betrothed to Walter Armstrong?"

"And now with the stain of dishonor and

"And now with the stain of dishonor and crime that he has brought upon himself—"
"Father, let me interrupt you. The terms you are bestowing upon Walter Armstrong are those which he does not deserve, and such as I am not willing to hear. You must have observed, sir, the attachment that was growing up between us. You sanctioned it. You made Walter your friend, and you admitted him to your family circle because you saw that he was good, noble and true. You even looked forward with pleasure to the consummation of our union. Is it right, therefore, sir, because Walter, as by every instinct and sense of honor he was compelled to do, has come forth a champion of his country in this great struggle; is it right, I say, to turn from him, and so he was compelled to do, has come forth a champion of his country in this great struggle; is it right, I say, to turn from him, and so freely brand him with dishonor?"

"It is dishonorable, Rose, to be a rebel—it is a mighty crime. Wrongs against individuals are circumscribed in their effects, but wrongs against your country becomes an evil that extends its bane through centuries."

"I can understand, father, why you feel as you do. It is the most natural thing in the world for you to espouse the cause of your king. Your education, your long-treasured predudices, your sympathies—all point that way. And so with Harry, educated in England, and nurtured into a chrivalrous devotion to the king, every impulse of his heart prompts him to draw his sword on the royal side. But not so with Walter. As it is natural for you and Harry to sympathize with the king, so it is natural for Walter to follow these great spirits who are guiding their countrymen in their resistance against oppression. I wish, father, that you could look upon Walter's conduct in this light."

"This is waste of words," said Mr. Elsworth. "I did not send for you for an argument. Rose.

"This is waste of words," said Mr. Elsworth

"This is waste of words," said Mr. Elsworthe "I did not send for you for an argument, Rose. I cannot let my daughter marry a rebel."
"If I were a more child, father, you would be justified in exercising your authority. But I am a woman old enough to know my own heart—old enough not to be misled by mere fancy. I love Walter Armstrong, father. I have given a woman's promise to marry him—a woman's promise to marry him—a woman's promise which is free."
"Girl, I will not listen to you," replied Mr. Elsworth, rising quite excited. "I sent for you to express my disapprobation of your connection with Walter. My commands upon the matter are explicit. I forbid you to marry him." "Father!"

"Understand me, girl! I decline to continue the argument. My meaning is clear enough. Moreover," resumed he, "we shall leave this place and return to town. Here we are exposed to the marauding and brigandary attacks of your apostles of liberty. When the people come back to their senses we can return." He turned upon his heel, and abruptly left the room Rose flung herself into a chair, and leaned her face upon her hand. She was not surprised at the result of the interview. It was what she had expected and dreaded, but now that it had come, she experienced how inexpressibly bitter was.

Rose's heart rebelled against the injustice of her father's decision with more bitterness and feeling, because the love between Walter and herself had been fostered by him—encouraged and smiled upon by him. He had fanned the flame, and now carnicionally sought to exflame, and now capriciously sought to extinguish it. But it blazed up beyond the power of his breath. It lived a thing of power and pride, of strength and courage, and could not be controlled.

Some hours later in the day, as she was seated alone in one of the lower rooms, a cloaked figure approached the window, and leaped into the room. It was Walter Armstrong, who tearing off his cloak, ran up to Rose with extended hands.

tended hands.
"Why, Walter," exclaimed Rose, as she received a warm salutation upon the cheek from Walter's lips, "I'm so very glad to see you. How you look. Brown as a nut, and so like a soldier!"
"With a soldier's appetite, Rose. I've neither attended to the production of the pro ate nor drunk since midnight."

"Wait," said Rose, "I'll bring you refreshments myself. Ah, Walter, now you are my hero! I must hear all your adventures. But I'll be back directly."

I'll be back directly."
Rose soon returned with sandwiches and wine, and Walter fell to consuming them with a vast relish, while Rose drew up to his side. "Now, Walter," said Rose, when his appetite began to wane, "I must have a history of your doings; and you recollect you promised me, when next we met, to tell me all about that marvelous and secret adventure of yours, which tumbled you into a captaincy so suddenly. Shall I have it now?"
"If you wish it, certainly. You know, Rose.

which tumbled you into a captaincy so suddenly. Shall I have it now?"

"If you wish it, certainly. You know, Rose, how at first I concealed my whiggish principles from you, fearing the consequences of an avowal, but you do not know how in secret I fretted and raved at the weakness which kept me at your side. While in this state of mind an unexpected opportunity was afforded me of doing our cause a decided service. I seized upon it at once, determined to make amends for my past inactivity by a brilliant exploit, and if the loss of your hand was the consequence, to find what compensation I could for such a calamity in the fame attending the adventure. In brief, I resolved at once to come out boldly a rebel—and to signalize my advent by a bold and brilliant stroke. An English officer, high in rank, was encamped with his troop at a certain locality. The officer's headquarters were tain locality. The officer's headquarters were in a farmhouse, and his troop were in possession of the outhouses, and bivouacked in the meadows and fields. This officer I happened to know was peculiarly obnoxious to Washington. One day I proposed a plan to three or four whom I could trust, for his capture. My plan was acceded to, and we prepared to put it in execution. Choosing a dark night, we managed to get by the sentinels by crawling upon our stomachs through the tall grass of a meadow. This was very laborious and difficult. We then had to creep cautiously along a stone wall, and watch a chance to dart rapidly across a space of about a hundred yards to the deep shadow of a tain locality. The officer's headquarters were about a hundred yards to the deep shadow of a huge tree that stood directly by the house porch. There was a sentinel stationed at this point, whose walk extended about fifty feet to point, whose walk extended about fifty feet to and fro. It was when his back was towards us that we took the opportunity, one by one, of darting to the tree, where we huddled behind the trunk. At last, at a preconcerted signal, we sprang upon him, gagged him before he could cry out, and bound him hand and foot. Entrance to the house was easily gained—we went into the room of the sleeping officer, dragged him from his bed, compelled him to silence by the threatening look of our weapons, bore him off, made a rush between the sentinels, and notwithstanding they discharged their weapons at us, we mounted our steeds and scampered off before pursuit could be made. There's my story, Rose, in the rough. I must confess that I have a fondness for such hairbrained adventures, and—a secret in your ear, Rose—am bound on one now."

brained adventures, and—a secret in your ear, Rose—am bound on one now."
Scarcely had the captain ceased speaking, when Kate came hurrying into the room, out of breath, and incoherently exclaiming that a party of soldiers were approaching.
"Red or blue?" cried Walter.
"Bless me, Mr. Armstrong! You here? Why, I didn't see you. You'd better look out, sir, for they are red coats, and there's a big number of them too."
"I must vanish," said he, running to the window, and then instantly retreating. "Why, we're surrounded. To the north of the house, quick, Rose. That's near the wood. Perhaps I can reach it. My fellows are waiting for me a mile below."
They all hastened in the direction indicated.

They all hastened in the direction indicated,

They all hastened in the direction indicated, but to their dismay they were just in time to see a company of horse come sweeping around between them and the forest.

"What will you do?" said Rose.

"If you've a rat-hole in which you can crowd me, after dark, probably, I can steal away."

"Up stairs, then, quick," exclaimed Rose.
Up stairs they flew, and upon reaching the steep-peaked garret, crowded with broken furniture, and the usual accumulations of a household. Rose said:

Walter crawled to the little foot-high lights that were set in front beneath the cornice of the building, and by this means could survey the lawn and road beneath. He withdrew after the lawn and road beneath. He withdrew after a moment's close scrutiny.

"Major Cleveland," said he.

"Cleveland," exclaimed Rose. "I know him. We met at a ball."

"The man of men," replied Walter, "who itches to get hold of my insignificant person."

"Lie close here," said Rose, "and I do not think there will be any danger. I must descend or my father will be searching for me. Come Kate," and they went out quietly and cautiously for fear of being overheard and seen. As they were descending the stairs they met a servant sent by their father in search of them, and with a summons for them to appear in the "A mac drawing-room.

CHAPTER III.

With head uncovered Mr. Elsworth stood upon the wide piazza before his house, receiving Major Cleveland and officers. The command was a company of dragoons, who were drawn up on three sides of the house.
"My dear Major Cleveland," said Mr. Elsworth, "let me welcome you zealously to this abode."
"A great many thanks, my dear Elsworth."

"A great many thanks, my dear Elsworth," replied the Major, as he mounted the steps of the piazza.
"I am delighted," resumed he, "to meet so true-hearted a loyalist. We pushed our march, sir, in order to partake of your hospitality."

"Will you enter the house, sir? The other gentlemen, I presume, will soon join you."

Major Cleveland assented, and Mr. Elsworth led the way to the drawing-room.
Rose was already in the room when they entered. She rose as the gentleman entered, and Major Cleveland, whose gallantry to ladies was notorious, with many bows and more airs, saluted her saluted her.

"It gives me infinite pleasure, Miss Elsworth, to meet you once again, for the recollection of the occasions we have met previously, are bright spots in my memory. Permit me also, my dear madam, to express how delighted I am to find that time, who deals so inexorably with us, has been won to favor you."

"Oh, sir, I thank you," replied Rose.

"And how comes on the loyal cause," inquired Mr. Elsworth; "will it be long ere these rebels are taught their duty to their king?"

"Have no apprehensions, my dear Elsworth," replied the major; "another campaign will scatter them to the mountains, and a live rebel be so great a curiosity, that to cage one and exhibit him would make a showman's fortune."

"If he knew there was a caged one here now,"

"If he knew there was a caged one here now," thought Rose, "how the major would stare."
"But where are your companions? I must see why they have not followed you," said Mr.

"They are delayed for a moment with the troop. They will be with you presently. By the bye, Miss Elsworth, I believe that there are a couple of gentlemen without, who are old admirers of yours—Captain Arbald and Lieutenant Marvin."

"Old Major! you flatter my taste."

"Old, Major! you flatter my taste."
"Why, with beauty I thought the conquest of the morning stale matter by night."
"Oh, sir, if staleness go to make their age, they should be proverbed instead of Methuselah."
"They were fascinated with you. My more

They were fascinated with you. My word for it, they would die for you."
"So they once told me, but I courtesied, and replied that I should prefer a live rebel to even

"And decidely witty," continued the major.
"Then they've been studying the almanac," cried Rose, who was giving the free rein to her humor; "when I saw them last they hadn't a grain, not even by scratching."
"Really, Mr. Elsworth," replied the major, who appeared heartily to enjoy Rose's thrusts, "your daughter has been schooling herself for a sharp tongue."
"That is her pride, sir. Her passes are but play."

"I'll be sworn her heart is as true as her wit.

She is—"
"Rebel, sir, from top to toe!" broke in Rose,

"Rebel, sir, from top to toe!" broke in Rose, with almost vehement emphasis.

Major Cleveland stared, and Mr. Elsworth fidgetted nervously, but at this moment the door opened, and several officers were ushered in. Presentations and introductions followed, and Captain Arbald and Lieutenant Marvin came up to pay their respects to Rose.

"Gentleman," said she, "my best welcome. My father is proud to receive you."

"You do not know, gentleman," said the major, coming up, "what pleasant things Miss Elsworth has been saying about you. They would have quite delighted you, I'm sure."

They bowed, tried to say something peculiarly elegant—and failed.

"Gentlemen," said Major Cleveland (holding a glass of wine in his hand), "I hope you will all fill and honor the toast I am going to propose."

The gentlemen filled. The ladies stood up.
"The ladies! Speedy priests and rings!" said the major, with a gallant bow.
"A doubtful compliment, Major Cleveland," said Rose, when the toast was drunk.
"Can you think so, Miss Elsworth? Marriage man."

"Ah, sir, marriages, though called matches, are mostly but sad patchwork."
"I rejoice to hear you say so. Unmarried you are a star which all the world can worship."
"An old maid, sir! Of many evils that would be the worst. Old maids and old bachelors are only the odds and ends of humanity."
"The happiest wit, madame, I ever heard," exclaimed the major, evidently quite fascinated, going over to her side, and speaking in a low tone.

Excited by the danger of her lover, Rose was giving way to a feverish and unrestrained mirth—to a temperament like hers, the natural consequence of an attempt to conceal the inward fear and apprehension she was experienc-

"Really, Mr. Elsworth," said the major, "Really, Mr. Elsworth," said the major, "with your permission, I am urged to impose on your hospitality longer than I first intend-ed. There are charms here difficult to with-draw from. Have I your permission to post-pone our further march until tomorrow?"

Rose started, and for an instant evinced some little apprehension. little apprehension.

"I shall only be too proud, sir," said Mr. Elsworth, "to entertain the king's officers as long as they will consent to make use of my roof."

"And what, sir," said the major, seized with a sudden idea, if I should go further, and propose an extemporized ball. I do not forget that I first met your daughter at such an entertainment. These gentleman have so long encountered bullets and muskets, they are eager for an engagement, with bright smiles, and flashing engagement with bright smiles and flashing

"And moreover," said Mr. Elsworth, "it would be a suitable festivity in honor of our recent Long Island victory. I only hesitate, sir, because of the incompleteness of our preparations."

"We only ask a dance, sir, nothing else."

"I will order the horses to my carriage immediately," said Mr. Elsworth, "to dispatch in whatever direction you may decide."

mediately," said Mr. Elsworth, "to dispatch in whatever direction you may decide."

"Then, gentleman, to horse! Ho, for merriment! Hunt up the petticoats. You, Arbald and Marvin, are keen of scent—away with you!"

In an instant all was spirited preparation and activity. Miss Elsworth descended to the kitchen, and directly servants began running in every direction, with dusters, glasses, china, orders, counter-orders, and so forth; vast culinary machinery straightway became in operation; and the thousand and one things began to be done and undone, which house-keepers always find so necessary upon these occasions.

Rose flew to her own room, and locked herself in. What would become of Walter, and what ought to be done for Walter? In vain did she seek for a plan by which he might escape undetected from the house. Everything which suggested itself seemed too hazardous. At last, offer entertaining and rejecting a dozen dif-suggested itself seemed too hazardous. At last, after entertaining and rejecting a dozen different schemes, she went out, and stole secretly up stairs to Walter's hiding-place.

She entered, and to her dismay found that he was not there. He had escaped, but how—and was he yet beyond danger? She hurried down again to her room and to the windows. Nothing was in sight. With an excitement of manner she vainly endeavored to control, she hurried to the lower floor, and upon entering the dining-room, to her astonishment found him there.

hurried to the lower floor, and upon entering the dining-room, to her astonishment found him there.

"Are you mad?" exclaimed Rose, "back to your hiding-place!"

"No, Rose, I shall not go."

"Hear me, Rose. After you concealed and left me, a few moments' reflection convinced me that I was doing a great wrong to your father in permitting myself to be concealed upon his premises. I am a proscribed man. I am what is called a spy. My concealment here compromises your father. If I were discovered, the consequences to him would be severe. I cannot consent to expose him to those consequences. I would rather openly deliver myself into Major Cleveland's hands."

"Foolish man! You are ruining all. Walter, for my sake go back again. This is a ridiculous and false sense of honor."

"No, Rose, I am resolved."

"Walter, I implore you. 'Tis death to remain here—"
Rose was standing with her back to the door.

Rose was standing with her back to the door, which in her confusion and surprise she had left wide open. Walter's face was turned to-wards it. In the midst of her impetuous remonstrance, Rose saw her lover give a sudden start at something over her shoulder. She

Know What Your Dealer Pays

THIS book tells pretty nearly what your dealer pays for everything. It quotes wholesale prices on 70,000 articles, and shows pictures of 17,000 of them. It includes practically everything that anybody uses, wears or eats; and its prices are the lowest ever quoted. It will save the average family at least $100.00 per year—some $500.00. Two million people send for this book yearly as a buying guide, and we want you to have one, too.

For 30 Years we have been selling merchandise by mail at about what dealers pay. Ours is the original catalogue business, and the greatest mail order house in the world. This enormous business has been gained and held by underselling everybody, treating customers fairly, and doing as we agree.

Two Million People are now numbered among our customers. We carry for them a stock valued at $2.500,000. We employ 2,000 clerks to fill their orders. It requires 100 typewriters to write our letters to them.

You Need This Book because you can rely on it. Other catologues are offered you, but this one is best. Our house is the oldest and largest, and our prices are always the lowest. Our guarantee is the fairest, and our record of a quarter century assures you of fair dealing. We keep our customers.

We Guarantee Satisfaction and safe delivery. Every article in our catalogue is described exactly as it is. Not the slightest exaggeration is ever permitted. But if anything you get doesn't suit you in quality, or price, or fit, send it back and we will replace it. Or we will send your money back, and pay transportation both ways. We consider no expense or effort too great to avoid having one dissatisfied customer.

Two Thousand Stores in One Two thousand average dealers together will not buy so much in a year as we. The makers who sell to us have no traveling expense, no credit risk, no losses, no salesmen to pay. They save the whole cost of selling the same goods to 2,000 separate stores, scattered everywhere. The fiercest competition in America centers in the effort to get our Two thousand average dealers together will not buy so much in a year as we. The makers who The prices we pay are never much above cost; and goods that we cannot buy low enough are made in factories of our own. Is it any wonder that we can sell for about what common dealers pay? We get along with a fraction of the profit charged by stores. We have no salesmen—no selling expense save our catalogue. A dealer must make several times as much on each article to pay his expenses and live. Our expense is but a small percentage when

For two days the skipper filled in all the spare time talking about the ingratitude and the faithlessness of women. Then he fell into the subject of the human heart needing sympathy. "Perhaps that poor woman has been mournin' for me." he lamented. "I feel that she has been expecting me. It was a mis'able lie ye told me—that about she had been married"—and a flash of color came into the skipper's fishy eye. "Ev'ry time I think of how ye lied to me I want to brain ye." All the time he kept straight course for Block island and the broad mouth of the Sound. Seth noted this but said no word. He was crushed. It was a careful toilet that the skipper made, exhausting his scanty wardrobe and shaving himself so closely that his face shone like a glass bottle. Seth sat forward with head bowed. Nothing in the world contained interest for him now.

As the skipper was about to cast off the painter of the yawl he called to Seth. "I'm going ashore on special and private bus'ness and I leave you in charge of the schooner. I'd take you along with me and give you a few hours you along with me and give you a few hours on shore but I'm afraid ye might see some more scare-crows and shatter your nerves." With a sarcastic chuckle the captain of the Susan clambered down into the yawl and "I reckon I'll tend to my own errunts in this line from this time out," he mused.

There was no longer any especial need for Cap'n Skote Gregg to practice stealth in approaching the abode of the widow. Even if his cousin's wife did see him there was no word she could send back to Hobb's Harbor that could add to his troubles. July Ann was just as mad as she ever could be. Nevertheless when he came up the dark street he reconwhen he came up the dark street he reconnoitered carefully. It might be that the widow was married, after all. Cap'n Skote didn't see how a treasure of her sort could remain long now a treasure of her sort could remain long unattached. The night was moonless and the street lights were distant. "Throw over the ladder," commanded the well-known voice of the skipper.

When Seth saw the spread of petticoats on the stern seat of the boat, he gasped, "Cap. Gregg has eloped with the widow!" But it was the smiling face of Sophy that met his eyes when she clambered up. Behind her appeared the radiant visage of the skipper.

"Seth," he said, "let me make ye acquainted with Mis' Skote Gregg. We was married an hour ag before Mis' Belle Foster of Newport as witness and bridesmaid. No cards, no cake, and nobody's blame bus'ness."

With the hope of finding some wild flowers, he started across the fields toward Fisher's woods, but for some reason (perhaps the tears in his eyes prevented him from seeing them) when he turned towards home an hour later he had only a few straggling blossoms which were fast wilting in his hot eager grasp. In front of Turner's store stood a half dozen of the school boys, and as he was hurrying by, one thoughtless fellow stepped out in front of him. "Hullo Joe, where have you been? After a button hole 'bokay sure as I'm alive. Come now divide with a fellow can't you? "Boys help yourselves," and before Joe could hinder, the few precious flowers were snatched from his hand and laughingly tossed among the group. Poor Joe! His face grew pale as he stood quite still for a minute, then bursting into tears he darted around the corner. "That was a shame Bob to tease him so," said Fred Evans, "but what a baby he is and all over a few miserable weeds," he added in a disgusted tone, "what did he want of them anyway?" One Memorial Day Offering.

Written for comfort.

School was over for the day and with a sign of relief the Ferndale scholars filed out and quickly forming into merry groups started homeward. One shabily dressed little fellow however, hurried off by himself as thoughanxious to avoid his mates. "That queer Smith" was the way they usually spoke of him. He was extremely shy and sensitive, so after a few vain attempts to make friends, they simply let him alone. In his loneliness, he imagined they and strength so make friends, they simply let him alone. In his lonelines, he imagined they adepised him for his poverty, and a feeling of bitterness towards them had arisen in his heart.

Tonight he felt unusually sad. Every Decoration Day since he could remember, his mother had gone with him to the cemetery and to show the removal his heart.

But now there were two mounds on the hill-side, no mother to comfort him, no home but that of charity, and not a friend in the world he said bitterly to himself.

Tomorrow the little cemetery would blossom like a garden. Everybody would carry flowers for the graves of their loved ones, and he alone had no offering.

With the hooe of finding some wild flowers, when he sees them he'll know who did it and when he sees them he'll know who did it and when whe deen the who de the remetery ourselves" suggested one, "when he sees them he'll know who did it and when whe did from." "No," said another "wild flowers are mighty searce this year, and it's too late anyway to go after them. We haven't too late anyway to go after them. We haven't too late anyway to go after them in the cemetery out summer of a bouquet."

"No," said another "wild flowers are mighty search they say and it for."

"No," said another "wild flowers are mighty search the year, and it's too late anyway to go after them. We haven't too late anyway to go after them. We haven't too late anyway to go after them. We haven't too a twent the white the if."

"School Memorial Day land another "wild flowers and seer them he'll know w of an anchor and a cross rested on his father's and mother's graves. He had never seen anything so beautiful. Some one had made a mistake. Surely they were intended for Squire Jones' lot, the rich man of the village. Drawing still nearer he noticed a card half hidden by the fragrant blossoms, and stooping down read,—"For Joe from the Ferndale boys."

He stood amazed for a minute and then as the meaning flashed into his mind, he threw himself on the ground beside them and cried as though his heart would break. Cried until the lump had gone from his threat and the the lump had gone from his throat, and the bitterness in his heart had given place to tenderness and gratitude at the kindly thought of the boys.

It seemed as though he would never weary of gazing at them. He inhaled their perfume, touching them almost reverently again and again, and when he finally turned away there was a new happiness in his face, while the precious card hidden safely in his pocket, seemed to warm his heart and take from it its loneliness.

From that day he felt no more desolate and alone. Nothing could so conquer his shyness and open his heart toward his mates as this kindness, and as one good deed leads to another, so this act prompted the boys to further endeavors to show themselves friend-

And even more fragrant and sweet than the flowers, was the lasting friendship that sprang up between Joe Smith and the boys of Fern-

Possibly after all the Man in the Moon may not be lonesome when he says, "Here's looking at you" every month. The latest investigations of science declare that contrary to previously expressed ideas the moon has snow, air and vegetation. Given these conditions life may exist there and the broad smile that the man in the moon gives us may be the collected geniality of all the inhabitants instead of a solitary smirk.

On May the seventeenth our special ambassador to Spain will congratulate young King Aiphonso on his coming of age. The Boy King is seventeen on that day and for the first time assumes nominal control of his kingdom. On May the twentieth the United States formally withdraws from Cuba. The King assumes authority that is lessened of some of its most troublesome responsibility by the loss of Cuba and the Philippines. Our minister may really congratulate Alphonso for the kindness that America has shown in ridding him of a part of

The successful struggle against adverse conditions always awakens interest. The life of ditions always awakens interest. The life of Booker Washington is necessarily of interest to all Americans as he is endeavoring to solve race problems that concern every one in America as the conditions exist here. For that reason his book "Up from Slavery" has been read by every thinking American. It is, however, more than a study of social economy, it is the record of a human soul and on that side it appeals to all humanity. This is proven by the fact that the book has been translated into French, German, Flemish and Spanish.

May with all its bloom and promise always May with all its bloom and promise always brings a touch of sadness with every recurrence of Decoration Day. With each passing year the parade of veterans grows pathetically smaller until it is really the living heroes rather than the dead ones that touch our hearts most strongly. The old veterans have lived to see the nation for whose unity they fought grow in power and influence as a result of their struggle for its national life. As they drop their flowers on the graves that lie all too thickly, Lincoln's words must sound in their ears, "These dead shall not have died in vain," for a new nation has arisen from the graves of those dead soldiers.

A "COMFORT" story for our "COMFORT" readers by Mrs. Comfort. This author is very well known as a writer of charming girls' love stories, and Flossie Field, the heroine, is the brilliant authoress' latest and best attempt. "I consider this one of my best stories," she writes, "and I am sure the 'COMFORT' readers will know, love and sympathize with my poor little heroine as much as I do."

LOVE, THE SLEUTH;

Or, Hearts vs. Detectives in the Great "Purinton Mill Mystery."

BY HOLMAN F. DAY.

This is a strong, detective story and is written in the author's dramatic and vigorous style which has placed him at the head of detective story writers of this country. The scenes are thrilling, involving a network of criminating circumstances and thread of suspicion is thrown from one character to another in the story, until the mystery becomes greater at each installment.
"Who killed Caleb Brett," or "What became of him?" will be the questions asked until the final chapter is reached, as the story continues in strength and intensity to the end. fail to read from the opening installment which begins in "COMFORT" this month.

THE BOY FROM SANTIAGO;

The Youthful Error, The True and the False, and Tom and I.

BY MARY J. HOLMES. Author of "Lena Rivers," "Tempest and Sunshine," etc.

The "Boy from Santiago" is a short novelette of a young lad who resented his father's continual fault-finding and enlisted in the army going to Cuba. It is full of tender touches of human nature and pathos that made the celebrated writer, Mary J. Holmes, for continuous and pathon that made the celebrated writer, Mary J. Holmes, famous.

The "True and the False" is a strong story of pride and ambition and points a beautiful moral that crime must meet its just punishment and virtue its reward. This is a rare treat of the year.

"Tom and I" is a simple, pure, love story written in the author's best vein. All will love

"Nora," the heroine.

"The Youthful Error" is the story of a young life and the consequences that follow wrongdoing. It will make a sensation.

"I live away down South in Dixie. We have a delightful climate; grass stays green all winter and flowers never leave us. We have one thousand inhabitants. This is a great cotton market. We have some fine mineral springs four miles from here, and about ten miles from here, at Dumas is rich for several feet in depth, but beneath that is a blue marl. They can hardly dig wells on account of it. They have to dig through it for fifty or sixty feet. The water of these springs and wells petrifies everything that gets in them, such as birds chickens, snakes, or lizards. There are many beautifur rocks and shells with the print of fish, flowers and leaves on them. Your little friend, greet you, and nope you will enjoy us as much as we shall you.

"Our farm is down in a valley with hills and mountains all around it. Hemlock and cedar, spruce and tamarack trees grow upon them, and the Kickapoo river runs through the valley. Near the bank of the river is a hill about two hundred feet high, which is almost as steep as a house-roof, and nothing to climb by but bushes. It is about one mile in length, and grows gradually narrower until for about six feet of its length it is only ten inches in width; then it grows wider again. It is called Mount Pisgar, and the narrow part has the name of Lover's Rescue because a young man once rescued there from the cave below, which was infested with rattlesnakes, the girl he afterwards married.

"Another of the wonders of this state is a gulch washed out by rains and floods. This canyon is eighty rods long by ten wide, and forty feet in depth.

Wait four or five years, dear, and then, if you think such questions need an answer I will do my best to meet the case. Until then I would be a simple school girl, wear my hair in one or two braids, and let the young men severely alone.

EAR NIECES AND NEPHEWS: May, thou month of rosy beauty, Month when pleasure is a duty,
Month of bees and month of flowers,
Month of blossom-laden bowers,
Month of little hands with daisies,
Lovers' love and poets' praises,
O thou merry month complete,
May, the very name is sweet."

There, now that we have paid our respects to the month, I want to talk about some changes in this department. We have been receiving letters for some time past from the north, south, east and west on interesting but varied subjects. So now west on interesting but varied subjects. So now for a little change and also that we may become better acquainted, I invite you one and all to write me more particularly of your home life, for it is true that, "the corner-stone of the Commonwealth is the hearthstone," and how important is the work of every woman even in that sphere of life which many are tempted to despise as too narrow for their energies. But even if a woman, be "never heard of half a mile from home," the purity and loftiness of her life and the devoted unselfishness will affect with immense power every member of the home circle, and the influences which sur-

Reopie living in the larger towns and cities enjoy hearing from those in remote sections. They want to know how they pass their time both a sto amusements and home duties. So if you, dear reader, live in a very small place don't be afraid to tell all the cousins about your life and the more favored ones in the larger places can encourage you by their experiences. Let your letters now be devoted entirely to an exchange of ideas, the perplexities which come up each day, or of anything of ageneral domestic nature, that pertains to the home from the washing of flannels to caring for the baby. The purpose of this department is to bring us all nearer together, let our relations be closer than ever before and may we become more familiar with each other's home surroundings.

Our first letter takes us away out to the north-western corner of our country.

"Both Washington and Oregon are great lumber states, vast quantities of lumber being annually exported from them. Much of this lumber is shipped to the east, to China, Japan, Australia and even to India. "Racket reached the limbs of the tree and scrambled about in the dark finding nothing, then started down. During this proceeding old Cap. in order to be first at the expected coon, stood on his hind legs, resting his fore paws against a pine bush. Being quite a long dog his nose and eyes just protruded through the leaves at the top.

"Something was wrong with Racket's head for he lost his reckoning and came down faster than he thought. When about three feet from the ground he spied Cap's nose, and, still imagining himself some distance up, he thought that nose was the coon's, and that said coon had been in the top of the pine sapling instead of in the tree. So he pulled out the old horse-pistol and blazed away; then, starting to descend, to his surprise, he sat flat down on the earth. The boys, who had watched in silent amazement, stood staring at him, while old Cap, with many a yelp, made a bee line for home. The tip of Cap's nose was cut smooth off by the bullet; but it healed long before Racket head the last of 'his coon.'"

Mrs. H. G. T., Anaconda.—An excellent fattener, and a food of especial benefit to consumptives, consists of a fresh egg in the juice of half a lemon, with pepper and salt to taste. To be taken at noon and before going to bed. It may be taken three times a day if necessary.

H. L., Rockdale, Ky.—A superior remedy for dysentery consists of one teaspoonful of common salt mixed with two tablespoonfuls of vinegar with a pint of hot water poured over them. A wineglass of this, cold, taken every half hour will be found quite efficacious. If the stomach is nauseated, a dose every hour will suffice. For a child a teaspoonful of salt and one of vinegar in a teacupful of water.

Henry H., Portsmouth, Ohio.—No better or simpler remedy for acidity of the stomach can be had than bicarbonate of soda (cooking soda.) Take about half a teaspoonful in half a glass of water after meals, and on going to bed at night. The old idea that soda in reasonable quantity is hurtful has been exploded.

John H. L., Spring Valley, Md.—An obstinate ul-cer may be greatly relieved, if not cured, by wash-ing it with sugar dissolved in a strong decoction of walnut leaves.

Mrs. J. H., Lakin, Kans.—If your physician has told you to use the medicine you mention, you must follow his advice. He knows more about the case than any outside person can possibly. If you have lost confidence in him, get another physician.

Daisy, Melrose, Ark.—Vinegar is not necessary in making a mustard plaster. Mix it with bread crumbs and water, or flour and water, and the strength will be reduced. Do not leave it on too long. A blister is to be avoided.

Mary H. K., Columbia, Tenn.—For a sprain put the white of an egg into a saucer, keep stirring it with a piece of alum about as large as a walnut until it becomes a thick jelly. Apply a portion of it on a piece of lint or a cloth large enough to cover the sprain, changing it for a fresh one as often as it feels warm or dry. Keep the limb in a horizontal position by placing it on a chair.

limb in a horizontal position by placing it on a chair.

Harriet, Cape Girardeau, Mo.—Asthma is not a disease that may be cured ordinarily except by a change of climatable conditions. It may be relieved by various remedies, however, and one that is recommended is composed of two ounces of the best honey and one ounce of castor oil mixed thoroughly. Dose a teaspoonful, night and morning.

Lawyer, Dover, Del.—Scurf in the head is not always the result of an actually diseased scalp. In fact it is oftener not so. A remedy that will cure five times in six may be prepared by putting a lump of fresh quicklime, the size of a walnut, into a pint of water and let it stand over night. Pour the water off clear from the sediment, add a quart of the best vinegar and wash the head with the mixture. Only wet the roots of the hair.

Teacher, Frascati, Ala.—It your ear drums are not affected, and the slight deafness is caused by a deficient secretion of wax it may be remedied by the following: Mix half a drachm of oil of turpentine with two drachms of olive oil. Introduce two drops of this into each ear at bedtime.

Miss Nancy, Vicksburg, Miss.—Do not be alarmed about the violent form your "malaria" seems to have taken since you have gone where it is said to be free from malaria. Malaria is not a disease. There are malarial conditions of earth, air and the body. If you have been living in a malarial neighborhood until your system is impregnated with the poison, although you may not be actually sick, when you go to some place where there is no malaria, all the chances are that you will become sick, and have a pretty hard time for a longer or shorter period according to your recuperative power. It is the result of the system trying to rid itself of the burden accumulated elsewhere. Stay where you are, a change will be of no benefit now.

Book-keeper, Evanston, Ill.—A carbuncle is a much more serious affair than a boil, and you should consult physician. Carbuncles often continue for months despite the greatest care, and they not infrequently kill. That boil on the back of your neck which as you say "seems to have come to stay," is a visitor that the doctor should see at once.

P. H. McN, Mansfield, Ohio.—At the first symptom of a cold if you will take five grains of quinine or less, if you are sensitive to it, and repeat the dose in three hours, you will probably break it up. Quinine affects people differently, and while some cannot take it at all, others feel no bad effects, other than a slight buzzing in the ears, from doses of ten, fifteen, or twenty grains. It is of no avail after the cold has got a start.

Hiram H., Paradise, Pa.—Don't take a five grain blue mass pill as your grandfather did. The modern and better way is to take one grain, or perhaps two, in one tenth or one fifth grain pellets every hour. These small doses act much better on the liver and are productive of the best results. A teaspoonful of salts in a glass of hot water may be necessary the next morning before breakfast. In obstinate cases double the dose of salts.

Mrs. L. M.—writes for a system of exercise for home use. There is so much attention now being given to gymnastics and physical culture, that we here illustrate a few simple beneficial movements. Take exercise and let it be such that the general circulation will be freer, the activity of the heart increased—such as massage and passive exercises, gentle vibrations of the chest, slow and regular percussion over the heart, rotary motions of the arms and legs. 2. Bend your knees outward and downward.

3. Rise on your toes again.
Repeat three times very slowly.
Another movement as good is shown in figure 1. Lean against a doorway and rotate both legs alternately, beginning with the ankle, then slowly letting the whole leg rotate in a small circle. As shown by figure 2, lie on a flat surface and make knee bendings, alternating right with left, very slowly and very thoroughly.

Again, stand erect, hands on the sides, heels together, toes turned out; raise your arms slowly outward, palms down, then upward, palms facing each other; then forward, arms perfectly parallel and downward, taking meantime a full, deep breath. This movement is shown in figures 3 and 4. One good exercise which a woman can take without any preparation for it is to stand heels together and raise her arms outward level with her shoulders, then slowly rotate them. She should bend the head backward, arch the chest well and take a long inspiration with each rotation, rising on her tiptoes when the arms are at the top of the circle. This is shown in figure 5.

The Juvenile Essays.

The Winners of Prizes From the Various States in the First of the "Comfort" Essay Contests.

Notwithstanding the time was limited for responses to "Comfort's" first offer of prizes for essays on "George Washington," we received responses from our young readers in twenty-six states, although we are sorry prizes could not be awarded to writers in all reporting, because in those not recorded below, there was no competition, not more than one or two writers having sent in essays. in "Comfort" for them and we can only announce the winners' names and addresses.

We may say for the essays received that they averaged very well indeed for inexperienced writers, mistakes being few and the penmanship very creditable. The matter of the essays naturally showed much sameness, and it was apparent that not a few got their facts from the same source, and were not always careful to change the language of the book. One or two were in poetry, which was not as good as the were in poetry, which was not as good as the prose. Many whose penmanship and matter were good, were very careless and slovenly in their work and fairly stuffed their essays into the envelopes. Others wrote on both sides of the paper knowingly, and others did little more than copy a table of dates and events. We are particularly glad to commend the younger of our essayists, and little ones of eight and nine showed that they will be prize winners very soon.

showed that they will be prize winners very soon.

The following is a list of the winners, arranged by states and in the order of winning: California: Olive Dry, Redondo Beach; Benj. Philips, Seiad Valley; Irving McInnis, Vallejo; Mabel Nichols, Oakland. Illinois: Mamie Scully, Curtis; George Osborne, Tamaroa; Oscar Mounce, Salisbury; Thomas Crump, Bridgeport. Indiana: Josie B. L. Conrad, Linden; Leoto Moore, Elnora; Bertha Blair, Lexington; Ralph C. Wilson, Elkhart. Iowa: Harriet Hall, Dennison; Effle Lantz, Stiles; Fred B. Shoemaker, Washington; Trula Kepple, Ionia. Kansas: Pearl Joslin, Geneseo; Jessie Pringle, Irribune; Frank H. Farmer, Leoti; Charlie Le Huguet, Kansas City. Kentucky: A. B. Glass, Rockdale; Ruby Hastings, Smithland; Della M. Johnson, Guthrie. Michigan: Grace Ruth Burt, Dowagiac; Tweet Brown, Hart; Elmore Dobbs, Ishpeming; Loye Spencer, Imlay City. Minnesola: Grace Monroe, Mabel; Annie Andrix, Brown's Valley; Jacob Freese, Brooten; Lena Lewis, Tracy. Missouri: Claudia Lambrigger, Chiflicothe; Pearl Detweller, Drynob; Bertha Earnest, Willard; Lowell Grundy, Ernest. New York: Blanche O. Middleton, Lisbon Center; Elisie Lyon, Fair Haven; Anna Gross, Felt's Mills; Jacob Silverman, Brooklyn. Ohio: Letishe Neville, Cadiz; Blanche Manger, Mogadore; Carrie Craft, Ironton; Margaret A. McKenzie, Circleville. Pennsylvania: Jetton F. French, Gableton; Martha B. Shaler, Independence; M. Ray Jote, York Springs; Richard D. Lawley, Jr. Kingston. Texas: Mary Fordtran, Zapp; Jennie Wolauer, Italy; Clois Greene, Vernon; Annie Slavik, Hallettsville. Washington: Neellie Brewer, Kalama. Notice: Winners will please notify "Comfort' at once by postal to what postoffice (with name of postmaster) they wish their prizes sent, and also give name of nearest county papers. Otherwise the prizes cannot be forwarded, as names and addresses were not always written plainly in letters with essays.

CHANGE OF PLAN.

CHANGE OF PLAN.

Experience having proved that our first plan of "Comfort" Essay Contest would not result satisfactorily, as a test of the literary ability of competing writers. so many writing from states which failed to have the required number to enter the competition, we now propose a different plan, which we hope will be just what is wanted. Prizes will be as follows: 1st. $2, 2nd. $1, 3rd, 75c. 4th, 50 cents, and each writer must enclose with his or her essay twenty-five cents for one year's subscription to "Comfort." This will decrease the number of competitors and increase the chances of success to those who come in. As there are four prizes for each state and territory, there must be at least five essays to constitute a competition, we would advise those who wish to compete to secure among their friends at least five persons to write essays. In this manner they will be sure their states are in the competition. These friends need not live in the same locality—only in the same state. 17 competitors are already subscribers they must secure and send in one new subscriber and 25c. for the year or they may have "Comfort" sent to any friend they choose, and "Comfort" for a year is a very desirable present to anybody.

You will understand from the above that "Comfort" will distribute over one hundred and seventy-seven prizes each month scattered about so that four will go into each state provided a competition exists in each state, and the way in which the essays have poured in in answer to the first offer it would seem that nearly all the states had been heard from.

RULES FOR GUIDANCE OF CONTESTANTS

RULES FOR GUIDANCE OF CONTESTANTS.

The subject for the next prize essay (June "Comfort") will be "Kindness to Animals." Essays must not be less than 100, nor over 200 words long. They must be written in ink and on one side of the paper only. The writer's full and real name and post-office address with name of postmaster, and the names of the two nearest county papers, must be written in he back of the first page of the essay. Also the age of the writer. Essays must be mailed before the 26th of the month. The merit of the essay will depend, and be judged upon its originality, its correct English, its correct spelling, its correct punctuation, its correct apitalization and its clearness of language and proper presentation of the subject. Each of these points will count so many, so that in this way the youngest and least correct punctuation. Boys and girls are to be considered equally. Prizes to be awarded four essays were necessary for competition.

It was originally intended that the winning essays would be published, but we have received so many that there is not available space.

Practical Dressmaking.

To Make Old Clothes Look Like New.

So many questions are asked "Comfort" by thrifty housewives all over the country, how to make-over last year's things, and the best way to utilize old things, remnants and scraps, that this column will be devoted entirely to this commendable, many times necessary economy, and every worn is condibly. sary, economy, and every woman is cordially invited to ask "Comfort's" help in this important branch of her work for adults and children. Address, Economy Editor, "Comfort," Augusta, Maine.

dren. Address, Economy Editor, "Comfort," Augusta, Maine.

Mrs. Hyj. McD., Jackson, Ky.—To make a dress change appearance by new trimming: If the dress is elaborately trimmed, remove all the trimming and make it as plain as possible using stitching instead, and vice versa, that is, trim the plain old dress with new trimming.

Harriet, C., Lowell, Wis.—To turn a dress: After ripping, clean with gasoline. If it will admit, cut it by the latest pattern. If not, put together as before with new linings. Trim with graduated braids or velvet ribbon, putting the widest at the top, graduating toward the bottom.

Mother, Austin, Ark.—To make a dress for a little girl from mother's old one: Rip the skirt and clean thoroughly. It is best to wash some wool goods in soft warm water with Ivory soap shaved and melted in warm soft water, the quantity required to make a good suds. Dry slightly and press on wrong side with hot iron. Cut by a late pattern and trim as you wish. Clean and remodel the waist by removing the lining and cut into a shirt waist. Stitched bands of silk of the same color can be inserted in the fronts to widen them if necessary. Stitched obalra and cuffs and belt of silk. If wash goods, insertings can be used. In making any kind of dresses for children always put an "underflap" for buttonholes. Never cut the hem of the dress, then you will be able to enlarge the dress when necessary. The skirts of outgrown dresses make beautiful waists with a little tucking or trimming, to be worn with cloth skirts. Last year's cashmere cloak can be made into a nice gored skirt with rows of stitching on the bottom.

Mrs. A., Woodville, Miss.—To make a wrapper cheaply: Select good material which is the cheap-

Mrs. A., Woodville, Miss.—To make a wrapper cheaply: Select good material which is the cheapest in the end. If it be of wool goods, cut it by a pattern not too pronounced so that it may be remodelled. Never trim it elaborately, but daintily for morning wear. Choose the color which is most becoming to the wearer.

Laura B. D., Broderick, Cal.—To trim an old hat to make it look like new: Lemon juice and salt will clean Leghorn. Use a small stiff brush. Warm soft water and soap will clean any kind of straw hat. Braids can be ripped up and made into almost any desirable shape. If your black braid is a little rusty, use a good shoe polish on it, and you have practically a new foundation for a hat to be trimmed as you please. Then take your fashion plate, select the style you wish and copy it. Follow the description and you will find you have a model hat If ribbons, chiffon or silk need laundering, immerse in gasoline, and do not wring, but shake dry. Light feathers can be cleaned by washing in warm suds and rinsing; shake dry, and curl.

E. C. L., Weedsport, N. Y.—To shorten a gored skirt: If it has a flounce on it, shorten from top; rip off the band; rip each seam as far down as you wish to turn under (an inch or more), then take up each seam until it fits the band at the top, sloping them off towards the bottom. Press, and whip on the band again.

Kathryn K., Weir, Kans.—To make children's dresses: Do not sew the waist onto the skirt. Set the belt two or three inches up on the waist and bind the skirt. Set all ruffles up on the skirt and hem the skirt. In doing this you leave ample room for enlarging, when needed.

Miss Multon, Redfield, Iowa.—To change last year's shirt waist into a new spring double-breasted waist: Remove the gathering at the neck; draw one side over the other almost to the armhole, cutting off the under side, straight. If wool goods, trim the edge of double-breast, cuffs and collar, with a narrow fold of velvet and tiny buttons. In wash goods, use bands of insertion, instead of velvet.

Mrs. R. T. Y., Mickleton, N. J.—To make pretty neckwear from scraps. Scraps of white linen, too small for other uses, hemstitched and completely covered with French knots of any bright colors to match the waists, make very becoming turn-over collars. Black collars with white knots to be worn with white waists, also belts of the same, if fancied, and long India linen ties, stitched in bright colors using knots in design for the ends, of same color as stitching, are pretty for summer and may be made from remnants that might otherwise be lost.

Aunt Anne, Lim, Ills.—Summer vokes for dress.

made from remnants that might otherwise be lost.

Aunt Anne, Lima, Ills.—Summer yokes for dresses or waists can be made with bands of India linen an inch wide, hemstitched on both sides. Put the fine feather-stitching through the middle of band, putting bands together with beading to form the yoke. Run the beading with any bright ribbon desired. Do the feather-stitching with silk matching the ribbon. This done with black ribbon, feather-stitched, is extremely stylish for white waists. Ruffling, hemstitched or feather-stitched, is also very effective. In hemstitching the bands be sure to put a very thin hem on either side; whip together bands and beading; any insertion can be used instead of beading, if preferred.

Letitia M., Hockanum, Conn.—Get out your grandma's double black cashmere shawl; get a late coat suit pattern and new linings and make it into a spring suit to be worn with white shirt waists. The transformation is marvelous, both in beauty of suit and economy. It can be made plain with stitchings; or silk bands, braids or buttons may be used.

2272. SHORT SLEEVED SHIRT-WAIST. The fad of last summer among the younger ladies was rolling the sleeves to the elbow; apparently this was so satisfactory that the short sleeved shirt-waist has been introduced in consequence, and for hot weather in all sections is destined to be very popular. The model shown here is a most practical one, and will develop stylishly in a great number of fabrics. If designed for "best!" wear, Louisine in printed or brocaded designs is especially pretty, while lace-striped zephyrs, linen and printed Swiss will make an attractive waist for ordinary wear. Dainty bows on the sleeves and at the neck are the only decorations. Patterns are supplied in sizes 32, 34, 36, 38 and 40 bust measure.

2283. FRENCH FLANNEL DRESSING

34, 35, 38 and 40 bust measure.

2283. FRENCH FLANNEL DRESSING SACQUE.

This dainty dressing sacque may be fashioned of French flannel, cashmere or cotton fabrics. A tasteful combination is old rose cashmere with dots of black, and collar of plain old rose cashmere, and bands of cream lace. Pale blue flannel with flatbands of blue taffeta and a large rosette of black satin ribbon is also a good combination. Patterns are supplied in sizes 32, 34, 36, 38 and 40 bust measure.

2275-2256. LINEN OR CANVAS WAIST. The costume here designated is very attractive and stylish for street or house wear. It may be developed in linen or canvas and would be very attractive with the vest of a bright red color. Combined with the newest skirt of the season the whole costume will be pleasing to even the most fastidious wearer. Patterns are supplied for the waist in sizes from 32 to 40 bust measure, and for the skirts in sizes medium and large.

2274-2142. DENIM OR PIQUE WAIST.

2274—2142. DENIM OR PIQUE WAIST.
This dressy model is suitable for woolen or cotton fabrics and may be trimmed with rows of braid or bindings of contrasting fabrics. Denim or pique will work into this costume with bindings of white and make a very attractive waist. With the waist is used one of the most attractive skirts of the year. Patterns for the waist are supplied in sizes 32, 34, 36, 38 and 40 bust measure, and for the skirt in sizes medium and large.

ure, and for the skirt in sizes medium and large.

2274. APRON OF FINE LAWN.

The design here shown of an apron is one of the newest things of the kind. It is trimmed with a circular ruffle and plaited in one-fourth-inch tucks into a pointed belt; it also has a shaped bib with circular ruffle, and shoulder ribbons. It will require three and one-half yards of goods thirty-six inches wide with one and one-half yards of insertion and two and one-half yards of insertion and two and one-half yards of ribbon for shoulder decoration to construct this apron, which may be made of fine lawn or pongee as preferred. The pattern is supplied in one size only.

2286. THE VERNA FROCK.

2286. THE VERNA PROUNT.

This pretty design for little girls is especially arranged for developing in any of the popular cotton fabrics. It can be made of the most inexpensive goods, and yet be exceedingly attractive. A shaped bertha ornaments the shoulders, and by the use of contrasting fabric a guimpe is simulated. Patterns are supplied in sizes for 2, 4 and 5 years.

2290. A NEW DESIGN IN BOYS' SHIRT-WAIST. WAIST.

The illustration shows a popular design for a boys' shirt-waist. A box plait is placed at either side of the front and at the back. The middle of the front is simply closed with buttons and buttonholes without the usual plait. The collar may be made of white linen or correspond with the waist. Duck, linen, galatea, madras or percale are the most popular fabrics for boys' shirt-waists. Patterns are supplied in sizes for 4, 6, 8, 10 and 12 years.

2284. STRAIGHT FRONT CORSET COVER. The straight front corset cover is especially designed to wear with the dainty summer shirt-waists, and is a very attractive garment, easy to make, and most comfortable to wear. All-over embroidery is used for the girdle or bodice sections and fine cambric or nainsook for the gathered upper parts. Wide embroidery beading may be used for the narrow yoke sections run with ribbon. If tucks were desired as illustrated tuck the material before cutting out. Patterns are supplied in sizes 32, 34, 35, 38 and 40 bust measure.

2285. A PRETTY WAIST FOR YOUNG GIRLS.

A very attractive design for a young girl is shown in the waist illustrated. It may be developed in any of the silk, cotton or soft wool fabrics. It is made with elbow sleeves and for a guimpe, the bodice of which is finished with a wide Berths ruffle; the ruffle is tucked with several tucks and finished with a ruffle edged with lace. To wear with this costume any skirt suitable for a young girl of the ages designated would work in nicely. Patterns of the waist only are supplied, and in sizes for 14 and 16 years.

2282. THE NEWEST NIGHT DRESS.

In the night-dress here illustrated, we have a design that will be exceedingly popular for summer wear. The distinguishing feature is that the sleeve seams run into the neck band, thus doing away with the conventional shoulder seam. The material is tucked at the neck, and the yoke is then quite simply outlined with insertion; although it may be trimmed more elaborately if the weater desires. Patterns can be supplied in sizes 32, 34, 36, 38 and 40 bust measure.

The birth of a new day was told by its failing glory. Archie Holland realized that he must get as far away from the rendezvous before sunrise as possible.

He was walking rapidly through the wood, when all of a sudden he came upon two horses tethered to a tree. Each horse had a saddle upon his back. In the course of five minutes he satisfied himself that there was no one about the horses, and as it gradually grew lighter, to his joy he recognized the horses as his and Major Todd's.

He did not rush immediately to them, for placing the horses there might only be a trick intended to draw him or his companions out of the woods. At least, after a careful reconnois-

CHAPTER XII.

"I KNOW THAT VOICE."

The horses sniffed the air suspiciously, until they discovered who it was that was creeping toward them, but, as soon as they discovered their master, they became meek, and waited to be unfastened.

Day was dawning rapidly, and a bright day it promised to be. The birds were already twittering in the treetops, and a great jack rabbit hopped slowly across the piece of lowland. A timid fawn came in sight of the youth, gazed at him for a moment in wonder, and, turning about, fied.

The rays of the worning

The rays of the morning sun were already falling among the treetops when Archie Holland released the horses.

"I guess that there is no one here, or I would the state that there is no one here, or I would be a state that there is no one here, or I would the state that there is no one here, or I would be a state that there is no one here, or I would be a state that there is no one here, or I would be a state that there is no one here, or I would be a state that there is no one here, or I would be a state that there is no one here, or I would be a state that there is no one here, or I would be a state that there is no one here, or I would be a state that there is no one here, or I would be a state that there is no one here, or I would be a state that there is no one here, or I would be a state that there is no one here, or I would be a state that there is no one here, or I would be a state that there is no one here, or I would be a state that the state t

"I guess that there is no one here, or I would have the benefit of a rifle shot, ere this," said the youth, springing into his saddle. He then fastened the lasso about the horse of Major Todd, by which he led it.

With the rising sun bathing his fair young face, the brave youth galloped away across woodland and morass. Whither he was going he knew not. The direction of the boomers' camp was a little further south than he was going, and yet, though that was his ultimate destination, he did not want to go directly toward it.

destination, he did not want to go directly toward it.

"I must at least make some effort to find them," he said. "We can then go to the camp of Captain Payne, the Oklahoma boomer, where she will be safe, until she can be returned to the States. If the soldiers do come and drive Payne's colony out, they will not harm her."

He was reasoning as if Miss Daisy Miller was already found and all he had to do was to convey her to a place of safety. The country became more wild, rugged and broken; with bald rocks, bluffs, hills and forests. At last he found himself on a sort of a ridge with ravines on either side, so deep and dark that the eye could not penetrate them.

either side, so deep and dark that the eye could not penetrate them.

For several hours the youth had been riding over this country when he was suddenly startled by the report of a gun.

A wild shout followed. He turned his eyes up the bluff above, where he beheld a sight that thrilled his heart. There, not a fourth of a mile thrilled his heart. There, not a fourth of a mile away, yet in that exceedingly clear atmosphere appearing much nearer, was the detective climbing up an almost perpendicular cliff, carrying Miss Miller in his arms, while three men were in close pursuit. A light whiff of smoke floating on the air above the three pursuers, told that it was one of them who had fixed the shot fired the shot.

The man nearest the detective halted, with his knee resting on a jutting crag to steady himself, and raised his rifle. The distance was very great for an amateur marksman, yet Archie Holland, with a prayer for a steady aim, drew a bead on the outlaw. His finger pressed the trigger the moment the sights and the brigand had formed a focus, and the sharp report cut had formed a focus, and the sharp report cut the air. A wild yell, followed by another re-port, followed the shot, and when the small cloud of smoke had cleared away Archie saw the body of the outlaw falling and rolling down the cliff.

The detective has now reached the top of the bluff, and, understanding all, turns and points to a place not over a quarter of a mile on their left, where the ascent is not too steep for a horse. Archie understands the sign, and so do the two remaining bandits. In order to reach the point at which he can ascend the bluff and join his friends. Archie has to make a circuit. join his friends, Archie has to make a circuit around the two outlaws and is exposed to their fire. But, though it is a forlorn hope, he defire. But, though it is a forlorn hope, he determines to make the attempt.

"Get up, get up!" he shouts, spurring his own horse to a gallop, and dragging the other along after him. From a gallop they break to a run, over ditches, stones and brambles. With prodigious leaps which at times were dangerous, the horses almost flew over the ground. Holland now saw two or three men with guns in their hands running to intercept him. He wound the lariat about the horn of his saddle, and, taking the reins of his own horse between his teeth, prepared to use his rifle.

"Look out, look out!" came a warning shout from the bluff above, where his friends were watching him.

Archie cocked his rifle, and, just as one of the outlaws brought his gun to his face, fired at him.

Though the shot did not hit the mark, it so disconcerted the aim of the man at whom he fired, that he missed his mark, when he returned the shot.

fired, that he missed his mark, when he returned the shot.

Archie, still urging his horses at full speed, drew back the lever of his rifle, letting the shell fall out, and slipping a fresh cartridge in its place. By this time the next bandit was ready for a shot, and he prepared to disconcert him in a most uncomfortable manner. The outlaw threw himself on the ground to get a better aim, but at this moment the horseman let fly a bullet which struck the earth beneath his would-be slayer, filling his face and eyes with dust and dirt.

Just as the youth reached the small brook at the foot of the hill, a third shot was fired at him by some unseen marksman, the bullet passing through the crown of his hat.

Without slackening his speed, he spurred his horses up the steep ascent, waving his hat in defiance at the foe beneath. The steel-toed shoes of the horses sent forth showers of sparks, as they sped like lightning up the sharp hillside.

Archie saw one of the men who had shot at Archie saw one of the men who had shot at him run back to the cliff and begin scaling it almost beneath the very spot where the detective and the young lady stood. There was not a moment to spare. Doubtless, even as it was, the detective and his fair charge would was, the detective and his fair charge would have to escape under a close fire from the ruffian's revolver.

All these thoughts were like instantaneous flashes of light illumining the mind of the youth. He was now upon the top of the bluff, and saw the detective holding the limp and apparently lifeless form of Miss Miller on his arm.

arm.

"Great heavens! is she killed?" he asked, as he pulled his horses up alongside of Todd.

"No, only swooned."

"Hand her to me, and mount quick, for we have not a moment to lose."

He lifted the insensible girl to Archie, who placed her in the saddle before him, saying:

"Mount, Major, if you regard your life worth a straw."

"Stop, Arch Holland, stop!" cried a voice, but from which direction it came he could not tell.
"You can't get away. Surrender and all will be well."

"I know that voice," cried the youth. "I have heard it before."
"Do not heed it, it is deceptive, and will only lure you on to death," shouted the detective springing into the saddle. "Now ride for life."

Both started their horses at the top of their greed. speed.

speed.

"Crack, crack!" came a couple of shots from the rear, the bullets whistling harmlessly through the air.

Todd and his young companion paid no heed to them, and as the ground was level were soon beyond reach of bullets.

"Where did you find the horses?" Todd asked, when they were a good mile away, and had slowed up to a canter.

Archie told him, and then as soon as Miss Miller had regained consciousness, he related all his adventures since parting, not failing to tell of the mysterious crippled Idiot.

"He is the Oklahoma Mystery of which I have heard so much," said the detective, and then he in turn gave an account of the adventures of up," he said.

Miss Miller was now sufficiently recovered to Miss Miller was now sufficiently recovered to ride behind the youth, where she was more comfortable. Fortunately they had some cold provisions in their saddle pockets, from which they made a dinner. They found themselves hemmed in by the river, which formed a sort of a bend around this portion of country. At no place could they effect a crossing. The banks were precipitous, and the current too swift to admit of their swimming their horses over. All day they wandered through the woods, unable to get across the river, without retracing their footsteps, which would again bring them to that part of the country infested by the bandits.

by the bandits.

Evening was once more drawing on. In fact, it was already growing dark and gloomy in this vast old forest.

Suddenly a voice from the darkness, cried:
"Arch Holland! Arch Holland! brother,

"Arch Holland! Arch Holland! brother, stop!"

"That voice, that voice again," cried the youth, reining in his horse, and drawing a pistol. "I know that voice only too well."

"Heaven help me, I know it, too!" cried Miss Miller. Before another word could be spoken, three or four dark forms leaped out from the woods, seized their horses by the bits, while the dark muzzles of murderous-looking pistols were thrust into the faces of the riders, and a deep voice in tone of thunder, cried:

"IN MOTHER'S PART."

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY HOLMAN F. DAY.

Copyright, 1902, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

—This only "mother's part."

In "mother's part" are the queer, quaint things That she brought from the old home place; She sits among them and knits and sings With peace on her dear old face.

There are braided rugs and rugs of rags With colors in curious blend;
And each means patience that never flags And a blistered finger end.

There are little tidies and odd, old "knicks," But nothing rare or fine;
—Too many the claims of her brood of chicks,
To fashion a rich design.

She made them all in the brief "'tweenwhiles" As she toiled with a faithful heart;
—They stand for the years of tears and smiles,
Those things in "mother's part."

The wealth of her children casts no spell,

Those things in "mother's part."
The wealth of her children casts no spell,
—The city has no charm,
She loves no furnishings half so well
As the things from the old home farm.
She sits among them all the day,
Dreaming of years gone by,
And each has its bit of a word to say
As it catches her dim old eye.
This of the living whispers now,
—That of the dead and dear;
Now, a smile 'neath her placid brow,
And now a wistful tear,
And children come, her boys grown men,
And sit with chastened heart,
Borne from the Now to the dear old Then,
In the peace of "mother's part."

To the "Comfort," San Felipe, April 10, 1902.

Dear Readers: I have been a silent reader of the "Comfort," from the day I first began to read, and as I know it is a "wide world" paper, I will see if any of the readers can help me find my lost brother (Gus W. Brune). Today is his birthday. If he is living he is twenty years old today, Although he has been gone four years on the 26th of June, we still put flowers on the table in remembrance of his birthday, but oh, how sad since he left, to look at the lonely flowers without the owner. Mother's and sister's eyes filled with tears. I have been thinking of him so much today that I finally concluded "the Comfort" can bring comfort to us sad ones if it can find Gus. He rode off horseback telling us he was going to see a cousin some miles off, would be back the next day, but has never returned. My father died the 2nd of Dec., 1898; his dying words were, "My boy, forgive me for ill treating you and return to those that love you." Gus was blind in his left eye, has a small scar on forchead, dark blonde hair, jet black eyebrows and lashes, eyes gray, tall and well built; he rode a Dun blazen faced filly, branded "L. M." Now if any one can give his sorrowful sister and broken-hearted mother any information, please do so. Address.

IN PINCH TIME.

VERY housekeeper knows what "pinch time" is, even al-though she may never have heard the name. It comes in the weeks of early Spring, before fresh vegetables and fruit make their ap-pearance, when the appetites of every one feels the effects of the first warm days and first warm days and the dishes that have been satisfactory all Winter pall in the taste. The palate craves something new and the housekeeper looks around to find it.

After green vegetables come housekeeping is simpler. But now one must make the best of what one has and that is not always easy. Yet there are unusual fashions of serving the old stand-bys in the line of Winter vegetables, and it will pay the woman who keeps house to study up a few of them.

Potatoes are a matter of course on nearly every table, but after a while the persons who like them best get tired of them, boiled, mashed, baked or fried, and wish there were some new way of cooking them. There are new ways, and here are two of them.

SMOTHERED POTATOES. looks around to find it.

new ways, and here are two of them.

SMOTHERED POTATOES.

Peel and slice a dozen potatoes and throw them into cold water. Let them stand in this for an hour, drain them and put them into a pudding dish with a small onion sliced thin. Mix the slices of onion here and there through the potatoes, and sprinkle them with pepper and salt. Pour over them enough milk to cover them well and put on top a tablespoonful of butter. Cover closely and bake in a steady oven for three quarters of an hour, uncover and brown. Serve in the pudding dish.

butter. Cover closely and bake in a steady oven for three quarters of an hour, uncover and brown. Serve in the pudding dish.

POTATOES WITH BUTTER AND PARSLEY SAUCE. Boil potates whole, first peeling them. Have them as nearly one size as possible, and put them into a hot dish. Work ten drops of lemon juice and a teaspoonful of chopped parsley into a tablespoonful of butter and put this on the potatoes. Leave the dish in the oven or in a warm place until the butter has melted, then send to table. If you do not like the lemon with the potatoes, you can put ten drops of onion juice into the butter with the parsley.

Rice is a pleasant variety on potatoes, but few persons know how to cook it properly. To boil it dry it should be well washed first and a cupful put on to cook in two quarts of salted water. The water should be at a galloping boil when the rice goes in and should keep in this state until the rice is done. This should then be turned from the rice and this left to dry off—as potatoes do. A variety is made as follows:

RICE AND TOMATOES.

Butter a pudding dish and put the boiled rice into it, stirring in half an onion, chopped, and a full cup of stewed tomatoes. Add a lump of butter the size of an egg and salt and pepper to taste. If you can get hold of a green pepper, fresh or pickled, and put it through the rice, so much the better. A few bits of dried red pepper may be used, but not too much. Bake all covered for half an hour, uncover and brown. This makes a very well-flavored dish and nearly every one will like it.

But one does not want all starchy foods. Potatoes and rice are very well, but they are not enough and even macaroni, while it makes a change, palls after a while. So one must fall back upon the old Winter vegetables or find new ways of making canned vegetables take the place of the fresh.

Of course it gives a little more trouble. But then one must expect that to get anything worth while. And it is worth while to make the place of the fresh.

Of course it gives a little more trouble. But then one must expect that to get anything worth while. And it is worth while to make the table attractive and to see the members of the family who have turned away from their food or complained that nothing tasted right, enjoy the meal on which the housekeeper has spent a certain amount of extra care. A dish that will appeal to those who like tomatoes more than will the everlasting stewed tomatoes, is the following: is the following:

SCALLOPED TOMATOES.

Chop fine two tablespoonfuls of fat salt pork and a small owen. Butter a pudding dish and put in it a layer.

put in it a layer of canned toma-toes. Sprinkle with the minced pork and onion and with salt and pepper. Have the top layer of crumbs. Strew SCALLOPED TOMATOES. bits of butter over it, bake covered half an hour, uncover and brown. Another excellent dish that can be made by those who are remote from towns and must de-pend upon the products of the farm is balls and the orange carrots cut in dice. Boil them until tender in separate vessels, drain them and mix them in a dish. Put a lump of butter upon them and sprinkle them with salt and peoper.

butter upon them and sprinkle them with salt and pepper.

PEASE IN BREAD PATTIES.

Cut thick slices of stale bread into fancy shapes with a cake cutter. If you have no cutter that will shape hearts or diamonds use the round tin with which you cut biscuits. Scoop out a hollow in the middle of each form, brush over the cup you thus make with melted butter and set it in the oven until it is lightly browned. Take the contents of a can of green pease, which should have been turned out an hour before they are to be used. Drainthe liquor from them. Heat a cupful of milk and add to it one tablespoonful of butter, a saltspoonful of salt in the middle of two eggs and the pease. Let all get hot together and as soon as the sauce thickens, fill the hollows in the bread patties with the pease and the sauce. Heap it up on top of the paties. This is pretty and good.

Nothing appeals so much to the appetite in the spring as green food of various kinds. On some farms there is provision made for keeping all winter celery and other green vegetables, while on other farms there is provision made by means of hot beds or cold frames for early lettuce and other salads. These are most wholesome and when they cannot be secured, cabage salad should be made. What is known as "hot slaw" is liked by nearly every one and makes a pleasant variety in the ordinary run of every-day vegetables.

Mince fine the been transpring of a bead of a phace. every-day vegetables.

"hot slaw" is liked by nearly every one and makes a pleasant variety in the ordinary run of every-day vegetables.

HOT SLAW.

Mince fine the heart of a head of cabbage. Make a dressing by heating over the fire a cup of vinegar with a tablespoonful each of sugar and of butter, a pinch each of salt and of pepper. Let them come to a boil. Pour it then over the cabbage and set it aside to become perfectly cold. It is improved by adding to it a couple of tablespoonfuls of sour cream just before sending to table.

This is a delicious salad and it is possible to compass others even when fresh lettuce is not at hand. Canned pease or string beans, drained and made very cold may be served with a dressing like the above or with one or three tablespoonfuls of salad oil, one of vinegar and a half teaspoonful of salt and a tablespoonful of pepper. They should be well mixed and poured over the salad. It is very well worth while to buy good salad oil. It will keep almost any length of time in a cool place and make possible many delicious dishes.

Potato-salad is liked by nearly every one. Cold boiled beets make a good salad or may be added to other salads. All these things have their part in improving the table in the farmhouse or in the small village.

Sometimes the extra trouble hardly seems worth while and yet in the end it pays for itself. It is very little care to add to the dinner or the supper the dish of water cresses or beet tops or dandelion salad, and yet the constant use of such things often has its share in regulating the system in Spring and saving the course of medicine that many people feel they must take in the first warm days. And there are few housekeepers who do not feel that the added care is more than made up for by the more attractive table. They, too, get tired of the everlasting round and long for a change and enjoy it when it comes. There are many novelties that are simple and cheap if they will but keep on the lookout for them.

Peel them and parboil them for ten minutes. Drain them and when they are perfectly cold, dig out the heart with a sharp penknife, leaving pretty thick walls outside of the cavity you make. Chop the onion taken out with a little cold meat and a few bread crumbs. Season with salt and pepper and moisten with a little butter. Put this stuffing back into the onions, set them side by side in a bake dish, pour about them enough weak stock to keep them from burning and bake covered half an hour. Stick a bit of parsley in the top of each before you send the dish to table.

Another nice dish is made by cutting turnips and carrots into balls or dice. If you have a little potato gouge you can make the balls and it is pretty to have the white turnips cut in

Whence Comes This Mighty Healing Power?

All the Land Wonders at the Remarkable Cures Effected by Prof. Adkin.

Free Help for the Sick.

Professor Adkin Offers to Help All Sufferers from Any Disease Absolutely Free of Charge-Professional Men Investigate His Powers.

PROF. THOS. F. ADKIN.

President of the Institute of Physicians and Surgeons.

President of the Institute of Physicians and Surgeons.

In all parts of the country men and women doctors and surgeons, clergymen and educators are wondering at the remarkable cures made by Prof. Thomas F. Adkin, discoverer of the Adkin Vitaopathic treatment.

Professor Adkin heals not by drugs, nor by Christian Science, nor by Osteopathy, nor by Hypnotism, nor by Divine Healing, but by a subtle psychic force of nature in combination with certain vital magnetic remedies which contain the very elements of life and health.

A reporter recently talked with Professor Adkin and was asked to invite 'all readers of this paper who are sick or who are worried by the ills of those dear to them to write to him for assistance. "Some people have declared," said Professor Adkin, "that my powers are of God; they call me a Divine Healer,—a man of mysterious powers. This is not so. I cure because I understand nature—because I use a subtle force of nature to build up the system and restore health. But at the same time I believe that the Creator would not have given me the opportunity to make the discoveries I have made nor the ability to develop them if He had not intended that I should use them for the good of humanity. I therefore feel that it is my duty to give the benefit of the science I practice to all who are suffering. I want you to tell your readers that they can write to me in the strictest confidence if they are troubled with any kind of disease and I will thoroughly diagnose their cases and prescribe a simple home treatment which I positively guarantee to effect a complete cure, absolutely free of charge. I care not how serious their cases, nor how hopeless they may seem; I want them to write me and let me make them well. I feel that this is my life's work.

So great is the sensation wrought in the medical world by the wonderful cures performed by Professor Adkin that several professional gentlemen were asked to investigate the cures. Among the gentlemen were Dr. L. B. Hawley and Dr. L. G. Doane, both famous physicians and surgeons. After a thorough and painstaking investigation these eminent physicians were so astounded at the far-reaching powers of Professor Adkin and the wonderful efficacy of Vitaopathy that they volunteered to forsake all other ties in life and all other kinds of treatment and devote themselves to assisting Professor Adkin in his great work for humanity. With the discovery of the Adkin Vitaopathic treatment eminent physicians are generally agreed that the treatment of disease has at last been reduced to an exact science.

In all some 8,000 men and women have been cured by the powers of Professor Adkin. Some were paralytics scarcely able to move, so great was their infirmity. Others were afflicted with Bright's disease, heart disease, consumption and other so-called incurable diseases. Some were sufferers from kidney trouble, dyspepsia, nervous debility, insomnia, neuralgia, constipation, rheumatism, female troubles and other similar ills. Some were men and women addicted to drunkenness, morphine and other evil habits. In all cases Professor Adkin treats he guarantees a cure. Even those on the brink of the grave, with all hope of recovery gone, and despaired of by doctors and friends alike, have been restored to perfect health by the force of Vitaopathy and Professor Adkin's marvellous skill. And remarkable as it may seem distance has made no difference. Those living far away have been cured in the privacy of their own homes, as well as those who have been treated in person. Professor Adkin asserts that he can cure any one at any distance as well as though he stood before them.

Not long ago John Adams of Blakesbury, Iowa, who had been lame for twenty years, was permaperson. Professor Adkin asserts that he can cure any one at any distance as well as though he stood before them.

Not long ago John Adams of Blakesbury, Iowa, who had been lame for twenty years, was permanently cured by Professor Adkin without an operation of any kind. About the same time the city of Rochester, N. Y., was startled by the cure of one of its oldest residents, Mr. P. A. Wright, who had been partly blind for a long period. John E. Neff, of Millersburg, Penn., who had suffered for years from a cataract over his left eye was speedily restored to perfect sight without an operation. From Logansport, Indiana, comes the news of the recovery of Mrs. Mary Eicher, who had been practically deaf for a year, while in Warren, Pa., Mr. G. W. Savage, a noted photographer and artist, who was not only partially blind and deaf, but at death's door from a complication of diseases, was restored to perfect health and strength by Professor Adkin. Vitaopathy cures not one disease alone, but it cures all diseases when used in combination with the proper remedies. If you are sick, no matter what your disease nor who says you cannot be cured, write to Professor Adkin to-day; tell him the leading symptoms of your complaint, how long you have been suffering and he will at once dignose your case, tell you the exact disease from which you are suffering, and prescribe the treament that will positively cure you. This costs you absolutely nothing. Professor Adkin will also send you a copy of his marvelous new book, entitled "How to be Cured and How to Cure Others." This book tells you exactly how Professor Adkin will also explains to you how you yourself may possess this great healing power and cure the sick around you. Professor Adkin does not ask one cent for his services in this connection. They will be given to you absolutely free. He has made a wonderful discovery and he wishes to place it in the hands of every sick person in this country, that he may be restored to perfect health and strength. Mark your letter personal when

""Why, land o' love, young man,' says the old lady, 'why hadn't ye said so before? I've been hankerin' for a smoke myself, dretfully, for the last hat' hour, but I hate to smoke before men folks' less they use it themselves. Shall I trouble ye for a match?

"She reached down into her bag and hauled out a T. D. and I vum I never had a more sociabler smoke in all my life. I tell ye, ye run acrost some of the best folks in this world when ye least expect it."

The steps stopped out in the kitchen. The rest of the circle set there with their hands on the table but they wastemblin' ike a cup custard on a thrashin' machine. Then came a rap on the settin' rom door.

"Why, land o' love, young man,' says the told lady, 'why hadn't ye said so before? I've been hankerin' for a smoke myself, dretfully,
for the last hat hour, but

"Showley and hauled out a T. D. and I vum I never had a more sociabler smoke in all my life. I tell ye, ye run acrost some of the best folks in this world when ye least expect it."

The stage-driver went out with his mail bags.

"I spose." growled Teed Strout, "if she'd hauled out a fisk and said, 'Here's lookin' at ye!' Ran would have thought she was an angel on earth. For my part I don't like wimmenfolks to be like Boston drummers.

"You've see here behind this stove an

"I do.

It was pretty plain that Uncle Ike not bein' used to talkin' with sperits was sort of gittin' to the end of his conversational rope. But after a little hitch he asked again.

"'Don't dew much, I "'Don't dew much, I s'pose, but fly 'round and spose, but hy round and jest have a good time?'

"'That's it.'
"Ike hung up quite a while thinkin' of suthin' else to say. Fin'ly he asked, 'I s'pose souls run big and little there 'bout the seme's your bedies do the same's your bodies do on earth?'
""'Bout the same,' said

Athaniel.

"'Haow much do you measure from tip to tip, Athanial?' asked Ike. Ye see he reckined Ath. must be an all-fired big angel and he wanted statistics."
"Did he say?" inquired Wack.

"Seemed to kind of make him huffy," said Ezra, "for he gave a clip on the table that prutty nigh split the top and off he went. Ike says if it's got so that sperits git mad and won't answer sensible questions he don't care about 'tendin' out on any more seeances and bein' insulted."

"I don't blame Athanial," said The Post-master. "It's puttin' a sperit right on the same plane with a henhawk."
"Did ye ever try to carry on a conversation with a sperit?" asked Ezra, pushing the potato down onto the end of his kerosene can and rising to go. rising to go.
"Not t' I know of."

"Not t' I know of."
"Wal, don't ye be so sure that ye wouldn't make a break. It would be jest like an old numb-head of your calibre to ask, 'Haow are ye standin' the heat this summer?""

A CUTE SWISS CLO

Made of Swiss Woods, Handsome Hand Carvings with Leaf Embellishments on Top and Bottom.

Real Swiss Style, with exposed pendulum and weight. The movements in these clocks are made by hand of solid brass by old Swiss Clock makers, the finest in the world. There is nothing to get out of order, there are no springs, everything is operated by the weights bearing tension on the two wheels controlling the hands. The characters in Roman style, also hands are hand made of Ivory just the same as Plano keys and are very conspicuous on the dark wood face so the whole effect is very beautiful. This weight is solid metal, in the shape of a landsome pine cone and as it hangs on the six feet long chain next to the wall gradually dropping, dropping towards the floor as time escapes it is indeed a pleasure to watch.

You can't have too many clocks in your home and even if you have a number made of marble, iron, onyx or china, you have not got one that will give you as much genuine pleasure or be so much admired and coveted by your friends as this handsome Swiss Clock. Two times the importation into this country of these Swiss made clocks has been forbidden. However we succeeded in procuring, on very favorable terms, an entire consignment which we shall give nway absolutely free as premiums with our charming monthly.

SPECIAL OFFER. If you will send us a club of only 5 special trial subscriptions to this magazine at 25c. each per ear we will send you one of these Swiss Clocks as a free premium and send our tagazine one year to each subscriber. Clock will be carefully packed and sent y mail or express at our expense and is a magnificent reward for a slight fort.

For the enlightenment and benefit of its subscribers, COM-FORT has inaugurated this department under the title of COMFORT'S AT-HOME LAWYER, wherein well be carefully and correctly solved any legal problem which may be submitted. All opinions given herein, will be prepared at our expense by eminent counsel. Law suits can frequently be avoided by timely and judicious advice concerning matters in dispute; this, however, can only be done by one who is fully conversant with his or her legal rights and privileges. This department will also prove of great value and interest from an educational standpoint, as in it will be answered any proper legal question that may be propounded.

point, as in a way, and way be proported in a sit is one of the principal missions of COM-Inasmuch as it is one of the principal missions of COM-FORT to aid in upbuilding and upholding the saucity of the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to di-the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to divorce.

Any yearly subscriber to COMFORT fully paid in advance is neclcome to submit inquiries, which, so far as possible, will be answered in this department. If any reader, other than a subscriber, rishes to take advantage of this privilege, it may be done by seeding twenty-five (25) cents, in silver or stamps, for an annual subscription to COMFORT thus obtaining all the benefits which our subscribers enjoy including a copy of the magazine for one year.
Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any legal question, privately mailed, it may be hal by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing the same to "THE EDITOR, COMFORT'S ATHOHE LAWYER," Augusta, Maine, and in reply a carefully prepared opinion will be sent in an early mail.
Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons seeking advice in this column but not necessarily for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

Judith.—Under the laws of Maine, an unsecured note outlaws within six years from the date of its maturity or the last payment made under it. If however, the note is under seal, it is good for twenty years after last payment or maturity. It is possible, though not usual, for a creditor to obtain an execution against a debtor without the knowledge of the latter. Usually the summons in a case is served in person on the debtor; where however this is impossible, an attachment may under certain circumstances be issued directly against the property of the debtor, without personal notice to him. Of such proceedings notice is sent to the debtor by publication in a paper published in the County where the action is brought.

A. B.—Where the title to real estate is in the name of

A. B.—Where the title to real estate is in the name of the husband, even though it was nequired by the joint efforts of himself and other members of the family, it may still be taken for an indebtedness against him. The fact that legal title is inhim, makes it a part of his estate and subject to the payment of his debts. A morting of real estate to be perfectly valid, and good security, where same is made by a married man, must be joined in by his wife, to pass all dower interest in the property. Your question with reference to the payment of taxes of your father's property and the interest of his daughter therein depends on many circumstances which are not disclosed in your letter. If the daughter bought in the property at tax sale, she might obtain a tax title. If she simply paid the taxes and took receipts therefor, other questions would arise which the local Courts might be called upon to unravel. If you will write the Editor of this column the facts just as they are, he will write you further about it.

Texas.—If a man leads a woman astray under promise he will write you forther about it.

Texas.—If a man leads a woman astray under promise of marriage and a child is born, the man is compelled either to marry the woman or to make provision provided by the law of the State for the maintenance and support of the child. If the woman refuses to marry him, he is of course, absolved from such duty, but must nevertheless support the child, that is, make suitable monetary provision for it. Failure to do so, would result in a conviction, on proper proof, of the crime of bastardy and the offender would be tried before a Jury, who would determine the degree of his guilt. As a rule, a reasonable provision for the support of the child is all that is required in such cases. The law is no respector of persons and holds out no revenge to the woman who permits herself to be seduced. The only redress is to make the man responsible for the child, contribute to its support.

E. D. Under the facts as you state them, the wife has

E. D. Under the facts as you state them, the wife has or right to dispose arbitrarily of the father's estate. The personal property which the deceased left, will descend to her, but the farm proper, that is the real estate, must be seend to his heirs—the two sons—leaving the widow nowever, her dower interest during her lifetime. The proper procedure is to apply to the Widows' and Orbitans' Court for the appointment of an administrator, which should be done at once by either one of the two lons. Consult a local lawyer at your County seat.

Widow.—A widow who has never resided in a state or with her deceased husband in such state, is not entitled to the homestead of her deceased husband in such state.

Jury.—Where a juror has formed an opinion from reading newspapers as to the crime charged, he may be required to serve if he declares an oath that he will base his verdict exclusively on the law and the evidence introduced and admitted.

his verdict exclusively on the law and the evidence introduced and admitted.

Jane, -If your brother-in-law advised you to give him a power of attorney to manage your land but induced you to sign what was in fact a deed, you supposing it to be simply a power of attorney, he simply became a trustee for you and is bound to re-convey the land to you and to account to you for the profits derived from it.

G. L. K.—Porcible entry and detainer is the appropriate remedy to recover lands from one who has settled thereon without color of title and to which you have the right of possession. Such an action must be begundn the county where the land is located; you will probably have to consult a local lawyer.

Owner.—If you paid the tax voluntarily, you cannot recover it back, under any circumstances; if, however, you paid it under any circumstances; if, however, you paid it under any circumstances; if, however, you paid it under any circumstances; if however to back in case the courts decide that it was sillegally levied or unwarranted for any reason. Money voluntarily paid can never be recovered in such a case.

Lands.—If a contest over the rights of parties to a por-tion of the public domain, the final decision of the land department at Washington is conclusive and binding, and from it there is neither appeal nor redress. The Sec-retary of the Interior (one of the President's cabinet), has sole jurisdiction over the matter.

Edward.—Where a land owner has not been paid for land taken for a public road, he has no right to obstruct the same. He will undoubtedly in due course, receive such compensation as the court has awarded him for his property. The public has what is called the "Right of Eminent Domain" to take such property as is needed for the use of the public and the owner is paid its value at a price fixed by a jury of his countrymen.

T. R. W.—Where a person is grossly negligent and injury therefrom results to another, the party who made the injury possible is liable not only for all actual damages but as well for punitive damages to deter others from doing likewise.

For the benefit of our readers who live in the smaller towns and remote communities, Componer proposes the organization of Comfort Clubs whose object shall be to add to the comfort of living by bringing people together for their mutual instruction, improvement and amusement.

Knowing that social pleasures are lacking in the smaller places more because people do not know how to organize and what to do that is interesting and pleasing, than because they do not care for such things, Comport will undertake to suggest ways and means by which the young people, at least, may pass many winter evenings which would otherwise hang heavily.

First: The clubs, to be known as Comfort Clubs are would otherwise hang heavily.

First: The clubs, to be known as Comfort Clubs, are to have their membership from among subscribers to COMPORT, and ten persons or less may constitute a Club, In communities where there are more than ten eligible. Clubs A, B, C etc., may be organized, the objects of these divisions being to make it possible for sets of persons to make up their own crowds, for such meetings as they may wish to have. But each month there must be a regular meeting of the whole Club at which all members may attend and take part in the exercises.

Second: The monthly meeting should be hadden.

may attend and take part in the exercises.

Second: The monthly meeting should be held in some large room (church or town hall) and members are to read, recite, sing, play on some instrument, or act a short piece, the whole to conclude with some interaging game which Comport will present. Comport will also provide the program each month for the monthly meeting, so that members need only carry out the program which will be furnished them. Division meetings may be held at private houses of members of the divisions, and once a week if so desired.

Once a week if so desired.

Third: The officers of Comfort Clubs shall consist of President, Vice President, Secretary and Treasurer, four in all, and to be elected by the Club, once a year. There are to be no fees of any kind, but if at any time the Club wishes to raise money for any charity, small admittance may be charged at the usual monthly meeting. This can only be done by vote of the Club. Every member shall be entitled to invite two persons, not members, to attend any meeting, general or division.

Fourth: Each member shall wear a badge or button indicating membership, Compour agreeing to furnish appropriate badges without cost to members.

propriate badges without cost to members.

These general rules, which will be modified and improved as the needs of Clubs develop, are now given as basis upon which to organize the pioneer Clubs, and Comport will be pleased to hear from our lady readers all over the land concerning their willingness to undertake the good work. COMPORT will also be glad to reader all the assistance in its power to aid the cause of making life cheerier and brighter and increasing good will ado be awarded to the first club organizing and reporting to this office, which organization may take place immediately upon receipt of this notice. Various annual pries, to be determined later, will be awarded to Clubs forecastic cellence in attendance, numbers, &c.

Address all communications to Comfort Club Editor, COMPORT, Augusta, Maine.

Method of Organization of Clubs.

Method of Organization of Clubs.

Method of Organization of Clubs.

Let the person undertaking the organization notify sit or more subscribers to ComPoRT at the same postoffice to meet at a designated house, or room, and when they have come together, simply state the object of the organization of the club, as announced in ComPoRT and gether sense of the meeting as to organizing. If a majority favor it, proceed at once to organization by naming two or more persons, male or female as candidates for President, first. Then pass slips of blank paper around for each person to write thereon the name of his or her choice for the office, and the one receiving the highest number of votes shall be declared president. Proceed in the same way for Vice President, Secretary and Treasurer. Then the person who has called the meeting will retire and the new officers will take charge, the President in the chair, conducting the meeting, and the Secretary and the Secretary and the same as clerk making the minutes. The President will announce the program and call off the order of business naming those who are set down as taking individual parts.

The main idea is to have this part of the club's works.

The main idea is to have this part of the club's works simple as it can possibly be, so that members will find the duties a pleasure rather than a burden, the object of the club being the greatest comfort to the greatest number.

Comfort Club Game for May Meeting.

Comfort Club Game for May Meeting.

Comfort Club Game for May Meeting.

An interesting and instructive game, in which all can take part and which is particularly happy in affording a subject for general conversation, is what is called "The Portrait Game." In this the president of the club, with such assistance as he or she may select, cuts from newspapers and magazines some thirty or forty, more or less, portraits of well-known people which he numbers and fastens to the walls of the room with pins, so as not to injure the paper or plaster. He has a list of the names of the persons pictured, numbered to correspond with the numbers on the pictures. Slips of paper, numbered in blank, are distributed to all present and they go about the room, which is now a portrait gallery, guessing who are represented on the walls, and setting down the names of their guesses opposite the number on their slips. The person guessing all wins the prize, and the one next gets the second prize. The one guessing the lowest number gets the "boody prize". Any small article, book, piece of china, etc., makes a nice prize, besides the glory of winning. Lots are to be drawn for the prize when more than one is correct. This game may be also played with pictures of the well-known advertisements seen in the periodicals and newspapers.

Two or three charades may be presented if this game is finished before the usual closing hour. Here are several words from which to choose: Sham-rock, Top-knot, Work-shop, Pot-ash, Pitchfork, Friend-ship, Clerk-ship, Rain-bow.

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one month.

Dear Cousins: The pleasant month of May is with us once more, and I hope you all feel as bright as the month promises to be, and that the June roses will follow you always, as they do May. Now let us get to the prosier things, work, for instance.

The first question before me is from O. H.. Dardanelles, Ark., who wants to know the meaning of the words Europe, Asia and Africa. Europe comes from the Greek word Europos, meaning dark and was given by the Asiatics to the country west of them, that is toward the setting sun, or night. Asia is from a Scandinavian word Aesir, referring to the Asae or deities that came with the god Odin from the East. Africa is a roman word for Frigi, a province near Carthage, where the Romans first became acquainted with the continent.

Dolly and Polly, Evening Shade, Ark.—Dear me, little girls, the questions you ask me can only be answered by your waiting five years. Time will tell.

Triplets, Washougal, Wash.—Moonlight walks are permissible with a chaperone. (2) Girls should not wave handkerchiefs at young men from windows. (3) Don't wear boys' rings.

Sunflower, Sims, Ilis.—If you can get a music class as soon as you are ready to teach, it is preferable to school teaching, and as you have a taste for music, I would advise that. (2) Consult your pastor about your brother.

Ellen, McCune, Kans.—You will find what you want advertised in Comfort.

Ellen, McCune, Kans.—You will find what you want advertised in Comport.

Katie, Phillipsdale, R. I.—If you can not entertain the young men by playing and singing and by conversation, they must be too stupid for you to care whether you do or not. Find young men who can do a little of the entertaining, themselves. (2) Tailor-made suits are usually worn by girls older than sixteen. (3) White shirts in winter are liable to be easily soiled.

Hattie and Nora, Boomer, N. C.—Corresponding with young men you do not know is very common, very bad taste and very liable to get you into trouble. (2) Buggy riding and exchanging photographs with acquaintances are not so bad, but they should be indulged in with care.

Theo, West Milan, N. H.—You had better consult a physician. (2) The standard of academies varies, and you will have to apply to the one you have in mind to know if you can enter. Ordinarily the standard is not high. (3) January 29th, 1887 fell on Saturday.

Prince William Belles, Manassas, Va.—Coasting by boys and girls seems to be good form everywhere. (2) You are the only one to say whether you shall be swung twice in the dance. (3) It is not necessary to ask your correspondent to write again, as it is expected that he will. You can do as you please; there is no rule.

Sweet Peas, Warrenton, Va.—You may ask him for his photograph and also ask him to call. (2) Some men won't take a snub. Tell him frankly you do not want to see him. (3) I should think any shade of blue would be becoming. (4) Your penmanship is good enough for book-keeping. (5). Write to W. M. Clemens, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Three Sisters, Dorchester, Wis.—That plan of getting married may turn out well, but it is dangerously risky.

Sweet Violet, Texas .- Yes to all your questions. Rosalie, Alton, Pa.—You have the easiest way in the world to teach the young man better manners. Simply talk to him about the man you love, and note the effect.

Inquirer, Rochester, N. Y.—Thirty-two is just the right age for twenty-one. (2) If you are a young lady your father's friend should not be calling you pet names as if you were a little girl. Speak to your father about it.

Bonnie, Akron, Ohio.—There are circumstances which may warrant a girl in marrying at your age, but she would do much better to wait till she is wenty-one.

College Chums, Allen, Kans.—There is no cure for jealousy, more's the pity. (2) There is no set time for people to be acquainted before becoming engaged. (3) You had better respect your parents' objection to the young man. (4) Yes. (5) Choose a man older than yourself.

Red Roses, Vale, Cal.—A diamond is the stone for an engagement ring.

Kat. Laurel, Mon.—A diamond ring as a birth-stone present is permissible, but people ought to know it. *(2) Your cousin must be crazy if he is in love with you and threatens your gentlemen friends. The law prevents his marrying you.

Primrose, Clio, Okla.—I suppose you might wear a button with a boy's picture in it, but why do you want to make an advertisement of yourself like that?

Blue Eyes, Byron, Minn.—Girls of nineteen dress and wear their hair as other young ladies do. (2) "Goo goo" is harmless slang that doesn't mean anything, but silliness. (3) Seventeen is rather young for beaus and dances.

Alice, Perry, Iowa.—As the young man knows what your parents think of him and what you think of him, tell him to wait until you are twentyone, and you will marry him. If you really love each other the waiting will do no harm.

Empress, Etna, Ark.—Break your engagement with the young man if he has no more regard for your feelings than you say. (2) Young men and young women do not usually kiss upon meeting unless they are kin or are engaged. (3) Obey your parents is a good rule to follow, but there are times when disobedience is the only way. (4) The young lady's address is New York City.

Perplexed Brunette, Pittsford, N. Y.—Your little poem is good for the local paper, but I would not advise you to try a book of poems. Rejection of a manuscript is no sign of literary value. (2) You can't win his love. If he cares for you he will let you know it. (3) You will find in musical peribdicals advertisements of persons who write music to words.

D. C., Pine View, Wyo.—Vf you know the brake-man you may talk to him, but not otherwise.

Darling, Harvel, Ills.—Rings are not suitable presents. (2) It would be proper for you to have the young man look after you, on a long trip, if your parents sanctioned it.

WING * * ORGANS

We make the Wing Organs and sell them ourselves. They go direct from our factory to your home. We do not employ agents or salesmen. When you buy a Wing Organ, you pay the actual cost of making it and our small wholesale profit. This profit that we charge is very small because of the large number of organs we sell. A single agent or dealer sells very few organs in a year and has to charge a large profit. You can save from $50 to $150 by buying an organ direct from the factory.

No Money in Advance

We will send a Wing Organ to any part of the United States on trial. We pay all freight charges in advance. We deliver the organ to your railroad depot free of expense to you. We do not ask for any advance payment or deposit. You can try the organ right in your home for 20 days, and if not satisfactory to you we will take it back entirely at our expense. You pay us nothing unless you keep the organ. There is absolutely no risk or expense to you.

Easy Monthly Payments

that might cause their death.

That is the trouble—they do not know it. Hundreds of people whose heart is in a dangerous condition have no idea they are in ill health. Others treat themselves for diseases of the stomach, lungs, kidneys or parves, when the trouble is wholly with or nerves, when the trouble is wholly with the heart.

Perhaps you are living under a similar danger,— toms of heart " You may drop dead." disease are not hard to discover when you look for them, but as they are small in themselves, they are apt to be passed by unnoticed.

Every day you read of people suddenly falling dead from heart trouble without a moment's warning, perhaps as a result merely of a little exertion in catching a train or hurrying home from work.

Did it ever occur to you to wonder why so many people die daily of heart disease in the prime of their life, and in these days of medical skill?

Would you not think that knowing their condition, they would seek a cure in time, or at least avoid the over-exertion that might cause their death.

If you are wise, therefore, you will go carefully over the following list of symptoms, one by one, and see if you have any of them. They are Fluttering, Palpitation, Shortness of Breath, Tenderness, Numbness or Pain in the Left Side, in the Arm or under the Shoulder Blade, Fainting Spells, Dizziness, Hungry or Weak Spells, Spots before the Eyes, Sudden Starting in Sleep, Dreaming, Nightmare, Choking Sensation in Throat, Oppressed Feeling in Chest, Cold Hands and Feet. Pain when Lying on Left Side. and Feet, Pain when Lying on Left Side, Dropsy, Swelling of the Feet and Ankles (one of the surest signs) or Neuralgia Around the Heart.

Even though you find but one, there is cause for immediate action — the chances are many that your heart is seriously affected.

In such a case, your wisest plan will be to write to Dr. Kinsman, for a box of his celebrated Heart Tablets. They will cost you nothing. The Doctor has such faith in his treatment that he will gladly send you a box for trial, by mail, postpaid, absolutely free of charge, in order to gain your friendship, and to prove their great merits to you beyond all question.

If you have any doubt at all about your of knowing heart being sound after reading over the whether or not your heart is this trial box which he offers free. They may save you from serious sickness—perhaps may prevent your sudden death from a little exertion.

Do not be like the hundreds of others who have neglected to heed the warning and died in their prime as a consequence, but write to the Doctor without delay, enclosing two-cent stamp for return postage on the tablets. Address your letter plainly to Dr. F. G. Kinsman, Box 962, Augusta, Maine.

K. A. Sims, Ills.—When an escort accompanies a lady home it is not necessary for either to say "I thank you for your company." Usually if the man has been inconvenienced, or is under no obligations to act as escort, the lady expresses her appreciation of his courtesy by thanking him and saying it was kind of him to do what he has done. There is no set form for such speeches, and one may say what she pleases.

Brown Eyes, Gloversville, N. Y.—Any glaring and pronounced color, no matter what it is, is ordinarily said to be "loud." This is especially the case when there is too much of it. For example, a girl in a red shirt waist and dark skirt and hat would not be called "loud." Whereas, if she were dressed all in red, she would be. It is not so much the quality of color that constitutes "loudness" as the quantity of it.

J. C. S., Stockton, Kans.—It is always pleasant at parting with agreeable people to ask them to call again. A man does not usually say when he will call again, unless he is a very frequent caller. (2) Length of acquaintance does not qualify a man to put his arm around a lady. An engagement of marriage ought to be the only qualification, but it always is not, more's the pity. P. G., Corley, Iowa.—Young ladies should not attend dances without excort unless they are chaperoned. (3) When a popular girl has half a dozen men at an entertainment trying to take her out to supper, there is nothing for her to do except to accept the first one who asks her. WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

ITH our new Department on Health and Beauty, the questions hitherto sent to the Busy Bee column on these subjects will be transferred to that de-partment. We will answer the inquiry from A. J. H., Sedalia, Mo., however, as it was sent to us so metime ago, and these points in the care of the nails may be use-ful to many of our readers.

To remove white spots from the nails use a mixture of refined pitch and a lit-tle myrrh upon them fined pitch and a little myrrh upon them at night, wiping it off the next morning with olive oil. When about to manicure the hands dip the fingers into warm, soapy water and hold them there for a minute or two in order to soften the nails and the scarf skin about them. This skin should be gently pushed back from the nails before they are polished. It should never, unless absolutely necessary, be cut with the scissors. Hangnails may be prevented by proper attention to the scarf skin which surrounds the nails.

For manicuring only a pair of curved nail scissors, a nail file, an orange stick, a chamois polisher, a bottle of vaseline and a box of rose salve or nail powder are necessary.

Note.—The idea is that the center of the shawl forms a sort of a yoke to come nicely to the edge of the shoulders, and with this end in view it is often worked a little closer than the lighter border, even if the same needle is used throughout. Taste will dictate style, and both center and border can be made of any depth wished, as will be seen from the instructions.

Border.—First round.—Make two double crochet under chain in every space.

Second round.—Three chain, one treble, one chain, two treble, all under top loops of first stitch "miss one stitch, then two treble, one chain, two treble, all under the top loops of next stitch, repeat from *to end of round; join last shell to first.

Mrs. M. H. Clark of Pigeon, Mich. is one of our dear, smart cousins. Although she is over sixty years old, she does her own work and a man's work about the place and is helping the neighbors nearly all the time. She says she has made $200.00 worth of lace the past year and she has sent a sample of her tatting collars which we here illustrate. These collars are very easily and cheaply made she having made and given away about one hundred of them during the past five months besides doing her other work, calling this catch up work between times. Mrs. Clark says she cares for the neighbors' children when they go away. CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR JUNE, 1902.

JUNE 1-Sunday. The forenoon is not favorable for religious exercises and does not encourage early rising; the afternoon gives improvement and invites thee to busy the mind with literature and the intellectual engagements.

2-Monday. Begin this day early and urge all manner of business to the utmost during the forenon; especially favorable for the merchant and tradesman; purchase goods for trade; seek money accommodations and deal generally with corporations of wealth, public and private treasurers, and railways and their employees; as the day draws towards, its close a baffling condition is found to exist which hinders progress to matters in hand and forbids the commencement of any new and important enterprise; be sure that no matrimonal engagement is enterprise; be sure that no matrimonial engagement is made during the latter half of this day, if comfort and happiness in the relations is desired.

3—Tuesday. The very early hours are the best ones, especially for any of the literary engagements and for commercial contracts of magnitude; have business dealings in the early morning with persons in the polite avocations and with traders in fancy and artistic goods of all kinds; have care in the afternoon lest extravagance will characterize thy dealings; seek no favor from persons of wealth and postpone collections.

wealth and postpone collections,

4 - Wedweaday. Enter into no agreement to pay money in the morning or become bound as surety for others; after the morning the day should be fully improved for all honorable undertakings; bargain for lands and houses; make contracts for their improvement and deal with aged persons, the agricultural classes and mechanics; surgical operations and chemical experiments should not be performed, nor should trade be conducted in cattle, machinery, hardware, chemicals, glassware, or electrical apparatus.

5—Thursday. Have no dealings on this day with public officers or managing authorities or superintendents in great corporations or upon large public works; save no dealings with real estate men or those engaged a agriculture or mining.

6-Fridny. Do not deal with corporations or any organization of men; do not court or marry or expect much pleasure from social engagements or any of the elegant pursuits; give preference to the afternoon for the best work of the day.

work of the day.

7—Saturday. One of the superior days of the month and REGULUS advises his friends to engage actively in the prosecution of their several callings, but particularly those in the strictly intellectual pursuits; these hours are particularly favorable for the artist and literaticalike and should be fully improved for the inauguration of principal efforts, the forenoon hours being the best for commercial ventures and for all manner of appeals to mind; woo and seek favor at the hands of the fair sex and expect pleasure and success in dramatic and musical entertainments.

entertainments.

S-Sunday. The forenoon is the best part of the day; the afternoon is likely to give fallacious reasoning and unsoundness of doctrine to the religious discourse.

9-Monday. Do not expect much profit or advantage from the elegant avocations or from dealings in artistic or decorative goods in the forenoon of this day, when thou shoulds not have any dealings with public officers or persons in government employ.

10—Tuesday. Keep the eyes wide open against losses of money on this day; make no purchases for trade nor have any dealings with banks or other monied institutions or men; seek business favors from large corporations and thine employer.

11-Wednesday. A day of increased mental excitement; the mind in the forenoon is likely to be rash and quarrels are easily provoked; keep a civil tongue, be slow to take offence, avoid all controversy, be not careless with fire; be deliberate in judgment and particularly avoid rashness or impulsiveness in business ventures; beware of engaging in new enterprises now presenting themselves. The afternoon is the best part of the day and should be fully improved for urging every honorable pursuit; it is particularly favorable for the intellectual and literary pursuits and for engagements in business in fancy goods, jewelry, wearing apparel, and the nice things in life; the evening gives unusual pleasure from the social, musical and dramatic entertainments.

12—Thursday. An evil day; ask no favor from persons in authority, especially in public life nor expect advancement in employment; railway employees and officials in charge of public works are uncivil and not disposed to grant favors; scrutinize very carefully all business enterprises offering themselves on this day; for no matter how rosy the picture presented the outcome threatens to be very unfortunate. This is especially true for persons claiming this as the anniversary of their birthday or who wize born about the 10th of March, 10th of September, or 12th of December, of past years, and they cannot be too careful in their undertakings and of their health; ladies so born are likely to be upon or are in the midst of unpleasant experiences, misfortunes or sorrows through their husbands, fathers, brothers or lovers and will need to be unusually circumspect in all their acts; marriageable ladies so born should shun the matrimonial alliance at this time and be patient with surrounding circumstances; many of them will feel rebellious, prove headstrong and rush into danger fatal to their future happiness and success. Men so born will need to "watch all the corners," act very conservatively in business, and avoid rupturing existing business relations if they would study their own interest and welfare.

13—Friday. The early forenoon and late afternoon are the best parts of this day; use the former for business with plumbers, plasterers, glaziers, farmers, contractors and builders and the classes generally who are engaged in the laborious and dirty avocations; as the evening approaches conditions favor the mechanical trades, chemists, pottery workers and brick and tile manufacturers.

14—Saturday. Give preference to this day for active pursuit of business, replenishing thy stock in trade and

14—Saturday. Give preference to this day for active pursuit of business, replenishing thy stock in trade and dealing with judges, bankers, and all persons of wealth and prominence.

15—Sunday. The forenoon of this day is the best, especially for matters appropriate; the afternoon is baffling and disappointing; do not expect satisfaction from dealings with the aged or infirm.

16-Monday. Begin this day with the dawn and give all thine energies to business; pursue literary avocations, travel, engage servants, do important correspondence, and deal particularly with all the intellectual classes.

17—Tuesday. Make no engagement towards wedlock nor expect success in the elegant pursuits or from dealings in dry goods or fancy or ornamental wares.
REGULUS especially advises the fair not to let wealth or show tempt them to wed in these passing days for disappointment and unhappiness will in nearly all such cases fail to their lot, particularly if their birthday anniversaries fall upon the days indicated in the 12th paragraph. Buy no goods for trade nor deal with banks or wealthy persons. The purchases are likely to be unsatisfactory if not extravagant.

18—Wednesday. The forenoon is the best part of 18—Wednesday. The forenoon is the best part of this day, especially for any dealings with miners, plumb-ers, excavators, shoemakers, dyers, or farmers, and gen-erally urge the agricultural pursuits.

19—Thursday. Be slow to anger in the morning hours, avoiding all disputes and controversies and hasty words or decisions in business matters; avoid real estate transactions during the noon hours; but urge all honorable pursuits in the latter half of the day; buy goods to sell again and seek money favors and extensions of credit.

20-Friday. Beware of inaugurating any important venture on this day; avoid all kinds of controversy with public officials and do not offend thine employer or any superior in business.

21-Saturday. Defer correspondence and all literary undertakings in the early part of this day, but push all general business during the balance of the day.

22-Sunday. The afternoon and evening are the best parts of this day and favor engaging the mind with the elegant in literature and art.

23-Monday. Avoid quarrels and contentions; do not travel unnecessarily, especially in the very early or very late hours of the day; conditions conduce to explosions and accidents from chemicals and machinery.

24—Tuesday. Urge all the mechanical trades on this lay and have dealings with glass workers and traders, truggists, chemists, surgeons, cutters, tanners, cattle raders, and brass and iron founders. Make collections and have money dealings with banks and persons of wealth.

25—Wednesday. Give preference to the latter half of this day for the active pursuit of business; make contracts, travel, pursue literary and scientific undertakings; deal with booksellers, lawyers, printers and mathematicians; push commercial ventures and prosecute mathematical and scientific studies; the forenoon bids thee postpone dealings in fancy goods and apparel and all the nice things in life.

26-Thursday. Use the forenoon hours for dealings with government officials, politicians, and persons in authority generally; ask favors from thine employer and expect advantage.

expect advantage.

27—Friday. Keep a bridle on the tongue on this day; avoid haste in act and deed, and shun controversies. Surgical operations should not be performed during the foremoon unless absolutely necessary to save life; deal not with any organization of men nor with municipal or state authorities; use the afternoon for transactions pertaining to real estate or its improvement or with farmers, miners, or horticulturalists.

28—Saturday. The morning hours invite care in all transactions conducted by writing and in all the literary efforts and undertakings; sign no writing obligating thyself financially and be careful not to offend thine employer.

29-Sunday. An especially fortunate Sabbath day, indicating religious zeal and promoting pulpit eloquence and the enjoyment of literary productions.

30-Monday. Be stirring early and employ every waking moment of this day, preference being given to such as depend upon mental labor; urge correspondence; make contracts, especially those affecting legal and educational matters; hire help and push all matters of trade and business.

A woman's discovery By m a n y years of constant study and experiments, I have perfected a simple, harmless vegetable remedy that will quickly cure all female diseases, as well as the piles. It is nature's own remedy and will not only relieve, but will absolutely, thoroughly and permanently cure the ailments peculiar to women, such as falling of the womb, leucorrhea (whites), displacements, ulceration, granulation, painful or scanty periods, irregular menstruation and all the pelvic ills of women. It positively cures rectal ulcers, piles, hemorrhoids, tumors, itching, blind or bleeding piles in either sex. It cures promptly, privately and permanently without the repugnant methods in general use by physicians. You can escape embarrassing examinations, avoid humiliating exposures, cheat the surgeon's knife out of baptism in your blood.

The treatment is so simple, mild and effectual that it will not interfere with your work or occupation. Thousands and thousands of letters are being received from grateful persons from all parts of the world who have been cured by the use of this remedy. The first package is free, sond for it—send today. I know that a fair trial of it will result in your becoming its enthusiastic advocate and friend. With it I will send literature of interest and value. Do not neglect this opportunity to get cured yourself and be in a position to advise ailing friends.

Consider well the above offer and act upon it at once. It is made in the sincere hope of alding you and spreading the knowledge of a beneficent boon to sufferers. Earnestly, hopefully, faithfully, MES. CORA B. MILLER, 329 Comstock Bidg., Kokomo, Ind.

pressions before they are moved and allow them to dry. Then they are ready to send.

Smoked paper impressions are the best. But if it is desired to send a plaster cast, take plaster of Paris and dissolve in water to the consistency of thick cream. Pour this into a large shallow dish and when it is hardening place the hand, well-greased, pulm downward, in the plaster, pressing downward. Secreta minutes will be required to get this impression and great care must be taken in removing the hand, not to break the plaster. Casts are exceedingly difficult to send without breaking and should be very carefully packed in a box with the name of the sender written on it. Putty is sometimes successfully used in place of plaster. A good photograph if sufficiently well taken to bring out all the lines, can also be read, although in all cases the smoked paper is the best, if properly treated with fixalif.

SHALL lead off this month with the description of a hand belonging to one of the most distinguished Americans, Honorable Chauncey M. Depew. You will notice that his recent marriage is plainly indicated in his hand. Mr. Depew's hand is of the Grecian type—broad, full, with fingers of nearly an equal length, a strong, well-developed thumb and a well-rounded wrist, powerfully charged with magnetism and electricity. The little nerves drawn at the wrist show that he has a remarkable government over the supply of magnetic and electrical forces. The chemicals of his body consist of a full supply of sulphur, phosphate of iron and carbonate of calcium, so well proportioned that he should live to a very old age, as nature has given him a generous supply of life principles.

The little nerves at the wrist are called governments. They serve him as the reins serve the driver. By them he guides every expression, plan, execution of all business matters. To these little nerves he is really under obligation, because he uses them constantly—or, in other words, he uses them as a check or break to his rapid development of thought and action. These nerves, which are in direct vibration with the faculties of caution, comparison and calculation, are the chief executors of Dr. Depew's quick, sharp, keen, spicy wit and humor.

With his full hand and well-developed fin-

With his full hand and well-developed fingers, these flexible nerves give him the wonderful adaptability to govern and amuse. The skin on the back of the hand is very flexible. The expression of nerve cells and fibres indicate a fine organism, so acute to atmospheric, elemental and human vibration that he would make not only a good weather prophet, but a prophet as well in business and political life. The hairs on the back of his hand and wrist are charged with electricity and strength.

The thumb is indicative of logic, persistence and determination. The lower part denotes power to execute, to promote, to establish principles and to bring them into action. Palmists would say that he was possessed of a strong love power. As to sentiment, Dr. Depew possesses so much logic that his heart will never govern his head.

His activity has been so exercised that the sentiment. With his full hand and well-developed fin-

The little finger is extremely long. This is significant that he is capable of accumulating property, generally benefiting by speculative investigation—in fact, drawing to himself the good and luxurious things during life.

Dr. Depew belongs to the earth and air element. He should avoid using medicines of the mineral order. I doubt if his mental activity would allow him to rest, for the flow of blood through the veins in the hand is significant of a force which would prevent him from mental rest. If he does not force himself, and soon begin to use the governmental nerves to check his mental activity at intervals, he will cause a resistence in the flow of blood which stimulates the veins, the result of which will be that rheumatic and gouty symptoms will begin to show themselves.

AN INTERNAL AND EXTERNAL REMEDY THAT WILL GURE RHEUMATISM AND NEURALGIA.

"5-DROPS" is both an internal and external remedy, which acts quickly, safely and surely, never failing to cure these dreaded diseases. Swanson's "5-DROPS" taken internally will dissolve the poisonous acid, remove it from the system and cleanse the blood of all impurities, thereby effecting a permanent cure. An application of "5-DROPS" to the afflicted parts will stop the pains almost instantly, while the cause of the disease is being surely removed by its internal use. Aches, pains and soreness disappear as if by magic when "5-DROPS" is used. No other remedy in the world will stop a pain so quickly or effect a cure as soon as "5-DROPS"

SWANSON'S "5-DROPS" goes directly to the fountain-head of almost all diseases—the blood. It quickly, safely and surely cleanses the blood of all impurities, driving out the uric acid or other poisonous matter, and making rich, pure blood.

IT CLEARS THE COMPLEXION. It cures Scrofula and other blood diseases, which disfigure the skin and invariably cause endless suffering. When you are tired, worn out, depressed, wakeful and easily disheartened you need "5-DROPS." It is the most powerful nerve builder ever discovered. It will restore your energy, vim and push as nothing else can do. Many who have suffered years of mental torture owing to the terrible condition of their nervous system, have been thoroughly cured by only a single bottle of "5-DROPS."

A SURE CURE FOR ALL DISEASES OF THE LIVER AND KIDNEYS.

"5-DROPS" co-operates with the stomach actions, and a healthy digestion is therefore certain. It restores the liver to a normal condition more quickly than any other known remedy. It cleanses the kidneys, removing from the blood the impure matter produced in it through improper action of the kidneys. It never fails to remove the poisons which are invariably the cause of the disease.

"5-DROPS" NEVER FAILS TO INSTANTLY RELIEVE AND GURE GATARRH, ASTHMA, Sciatica, Lumbago, Colds, Coughs, Grip, Bronchitis, Nervousness, Backache, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Croup, Nervous and Neuralgic Headache, Earache, Toothache, Heart Weakness, Malaria, Paralysis, Creeping Numbness, Sleeplessness and Blood Diseases.

"5-DROPS" is perfectly harmless and can be taken by a child as well as an adult. "5-DROPS" contains no opiates in any form. No alcohol. No salicylates.

She has a fine life line, very long and with many lines leading up to it, which is always a good sign. She is a very ambitious person and her ambitions will be realized, although not without some difficulties with herself. Her fate line indicates that she will succeed in whatever she undertakes. She will be twice married. She has always been very attractive to the opposite sex and will continue so as long as she lives. Hers is a curious character, and while she is dependent upon others for sympathy and affection, she is yet very capable of standing on her own feet and forming her own judgments. It is claimed that this is an age in which the reading of the Bible is entirely or almost omitted. While this may be true as a question of religious application it is no less true that as a matter of literary importance Bible reading is on the increase. A recent edition of the Bible arranges its contents in a purely literary form and classifies it as history, genealogy, prophecy, poetry and philosophy. Within the bounds of the Bible are more than sixty books, the product of different writers, produced in different ages and languages. Part of the Bible was written in Greek, part in Hebrew but there is a spiritual unity which gives the book cohesion. The literary version of the Bible prints the Psalms as poetry in rhythmic form and also gives this form to many of the prophetic books. New force and significance is given by this plan while more of the spiritual meaning upon which the Bible has been wont to base its demand for reading is lost.

So many humorous paragraphs have been written on the variety of uses that women make of a hair pin that the mere word "hair pin" is a text upon which to pin a smile. It has long lived the double life of a button hook and a paper cutter but at last it has attained to real dignity of existence. A famous surgeon has noted the number of practical uses to which hair pins are put and has written an article on the surgical uses of the hair pin. The hair pin when taken seriously seems to offer a compendium of possibilities. No small basis to its claim for serious recognition lies in the fact that it is almost universally present. However, the doctor suggests that the hair pin may now be added to the articles a man carries in his pocket or may even be raised to the dignity of a place in the instrument case. As a working member in the "first aid to the injured" cases, the hair pin will be seen to take first honors. It may compress a blood vessel in controlling a hemorrhage, pin on a bandage, be used as a probe, wire bones together, heated to redness may be used as a cautery. These are only a few of the uses to which this article of feminine convenience may be applied. The world will watch with amused and curious interest the passage of the hair pin from jest to earnest.

The coronation of King Edward in June will be one of the notable events of the twentieth century. One feature connected with the ceremonies of coronation week is of particular interest to Americans. The Crystal Palace of London celebrates its golden wedding. It is just fifty years ago that international expositions were inaugurated by the opening in 1852 of the Crystal Palace. The development of the idea in national and international exhibitions has revolutionized the industries of the world. Fifty years ago at this first exhibition it was evident that England led the world in the variety and extent of her manufactures. Today America claims the commercial empire as her own. The manager of the Crystal Palace has announced that the special exhibition during coronation week will consist exclusively of American products. English companies organized to manufacture and exploit American inventions will be eligible as exhibitors. There is no doubt that American manufacturers will seize this opportunity for in ordinary years over two and a half million people visit the Palace and at this time the attendance will be greatly increased. The opportunity for reaching representative men from all over the world is unequalled. This gracious compliment from the old commercial ruler of the world to her young and vigorous successor is only another illustration of the kindly feeling between England and America.

Rose's consternation at this discovery was very great. The cry that rose to her lips was instantly suppressed. In an instant, she had assumed the most nonchalant air.

"Pray walk in, Major Cleveland. You've come opportunely. Let me make you acquainted with Captain Fuller. A friend of my father's. A neighbor. Captain Fuller, Major Cleveland. Allow me to commend you, gentlemen, to each other's better acquaintance."

"A rebel officer!" said the major, stalking stiffly into the room, "this is really very extraordinary."

"A rebel officer:" said the major, starking stiffly into the room, "this is really very extraordinary."

"Let me see you shake hands, gentlemen," continued Rose, "for here, you know, you must be friends. Of course, you sheathe your swords, and swear peace in the presence of a lady."

"Miss Elsworth will rebuke us," said the major, walking over and offering his hand. Armstrong took it ceremoniously.

"Now. gentlemen," said Rose, "sit down. You, major, shall have a seat upon the sofa by my side. Captain Fuller, please take the chair near you. Now, you see," said she, "I am between you, and shall prevent warfare. I here proclaim a truce. The captain, major, wants to join our ball tonight. I have promised him my hand the next after yours."

"I'm quite ready, Miss Elsworth," said he, "to laugh at a joke, but really I cannot understand—"

"I have but one reply to make," answered Walter; "if you attempt to arrest me, I shall defend myself—and will escape if I can."
While these words were exchanging, Walter stood near and with his back to the window.

Rose, meanwhile, unobserved, had closed the door; and standing erect by a chair, with pale cheek and glittering eye, watched the progress of the scene. At this juncture a couple of shots were heard, and suddenly a figure came bounding through the window into the room, followed almost instantaneously by two soldiers. The soldiers, surprised to find themselves in the presence of their commander, fell back and stood erect. The pursued was no less than Mr. Metcalf, the schoolmaster, who upon seeing Walter, ran up to him, exclaiming—

"What was the cause of those shots fired now?" inquired the major.

"This fellow, sir, attempted to pass without the countersign," responded one of the men.

"You see, sir," said Mr. Metcalf, whose droll humor could not be silenced by the occasion or the presence, "you see, sir, I was just about to Walter's scarf was a present from Rose, with his name embroidered upon it. Most unfortunately, neither Walter nor Rose had observed that the name was partially exposed. This discovery therefore startled, and threw them both into consternation.

"Miss Elsworth," said the major, freezingly polite, "I'm under the necessity of a disagreeable duty. I am compelled to consider our truce at an end. Young sir, you are my prisoner."
The major walked to the window, but Walter drew his sword and threw himself before him.
"If you speak aloud," said Walter, "or attempt to call aid, I will strike you dead. I shall not yield without resistance. If you molest me, blood will be shed."
The major smiled, and drew a small pocket-

"Do Captain Fuller and Captain Armstrong wear the same colors?"

"All continental officers wear the same colors," said Walter.

"The same complexion, height, and—" rising, walking over to Walter and pointing to his scarf, "the same love tokens? Does Captain Fuller wear Captain Armstrong's scarf, worked with Captain Armstrong's scarf, worked with Captain Armstrong's scarf, worked with Captain Armstrong's name?"

"This, sir," said Rose, "is a shameful breach of hospitality. Captain Armstrong is my father's guest, no less than yourself. Every consideration of delicacy and honor requires you to consider him so."

"I judge, sir. by what I see."

"You are severe."

"I am glad you find me so."
"Will you not say peace?"
"War, Major Cleveland, to the last."

"Daughter, more courtesy."
"Oh! father, they may claim and bind our poor country, but they cannot find a way to chain a free woman's tongue."
Rose walked the floor with blazing eye and cheek. The major gave his command, and Walter was led away under guard. Major Cleveland had stepped into the hall, and given his orders respecting the prisoner to a subaltern. As he did so, a sudden thought seemed to flash on Rose's mind; and, upon his reentering the room, her whole manner changed, and flinging herself upon the sofa, she burs into laughter.

into laughter.

"Really, Major Cleveland, this has been an absurd scene. Poor fellow! There won't be anything positively serious, will there, eh? But, don't you think, major, I made a good champion? It was really presumptuous for the fellow to come here, though. These rustic clowns thrust themselves everywhere."

Major Cleveland stared, and exclaimed—

"What, Miss Elsworth, Captain Armstrong then is nothing—" whether the previous or the present scene was acted.

"Your arm, major. There come some of the guests. I remember that my hand is for you in the first dance."

Major Cleveland offered his arm, and they left the room together.

"I really could have supposed," said the major, "that this American stood high in your esteem."

"Oh, I like him well enough. He is among the best the country affords, but that is very bad, you know."

"Then you bear me no malice?"

"Not enough to kill a gnat."

"Ah, Miss Elsworth, this assurance gives me greatest pleasure."

"Don't hurt the poor fellow though, major, I beg of you. I should be quite sorry if anything happened to him. He is a good-natured, useful neighbor enough—an unpolished jewel, papa calls him."

"The affair will prove a bagatelle, dear madam, I assure you."

"The affair will prove a bagatelle, dear madam, I assure you."

"Ah, major, our social wants in this community are lamentable enough when we are obliged to content ourselves with such poor substitutes as you have seen, for all the polish and manner of London circles."

"Lamentable, indeed, Miss Elsworth."

"The war brings one boon, at least," continued the lady, "the society of gentlemen."

"Very true, indeed," was the complacent rejoinder.

The major handed her to a seat in the parlor The major nanded her to a seat in the parlot, and begged a moment's leave from her side.
"Humph, Major Cleveland," muttered she as he walked away, "I'll so wheedle you this night you shall cry enough to a woman, even if itso happens that you have never done it to a man."

CHAPTER V.

CHAPTER V.

It was very evident that Major Cleveland was completely fascinated by Rose; and from the moment of Walter's unlucky discovery our heroine exerted all her powers to render the control she had over him secure and lasting. Her power of pleasing was very great. Few men could resist the charm of her smile, or the fascination of her glance. Her spirits were fine, her wit joyous, her manner agreeable beyond description, and her beauty superior. It would have been hard if a colder man than Major Cleveland had not yielded to a combination so powerful and so rare. As for the major, he was completely overcome. He was spellbound by her side. He was enraptured, and did not attempt to conceal his rapture. Rose smiled upon him, shot glances at him from her glorious eyes; her wit played about him in one incessant stream, spirited, brilliant, glad; she tickled him with the adroitest compliments, flattered him in a thousand ways; in short, with diplomatic skill, played her part to perfection. Bold, dazzling and daring, she conducted the intriguand yet all the while her heart shrunk from the course. She felt, however, that Walter's only hope of safety depended upon the extent of the influence she could obtain over the English of ficer. To save Walter Armstrong was her resolve—she could not be scrupulous about the means.

Twilight was settling down, and while those

Twilight was settling down, and while those of the guests already arrived were gathered upon the piazza or about the lawn, Rose and her admirer, by a movement which the major must have learned in his tactics, found themselves sauntering off apart from the rest through the mazy turns of the garden. They came to a bower, and the major gently urged Rose to take a seat upon a rustic bench there provided. She did so, secretly trembling, but resolved to dare all, when all was at stake. "Do you know, that I wish to see you united to some one who could give you the protection which only a husband can extend?"

"Ah, Major Cleveland!" said Rose, sighing behind her fan and dropping her head plaintively. He took her hand.

"Miss Elsworth! Rose!" He bent over her until his cheek touched her curls and wisspered, "Confide in me. Law work friend."

"Miss Elsworth! Rose!" He bent over her until his cheek touched her curls and whispered, "Confide in me. I am your friend."

"I believe you, Major Cleveland. I—I—really sir—I have nothing to confide."

This she said confusedly, and with agitation. "Do not be offended, Miss Elsworth. I have your interest at heart. Pardon me—but Captain Arbald—"

PORTRAITS AND PARAGRAPHS OF PEOPLE THE PUBLIC PRINTS.

1. Not a great many years ago there were in all the newspapers, pictures of a man whom Queen Victoria had said was the handsomest man in the world—Colonel Nicholas Smith of Kentucky. He married a daughter of the famous editor, Horace Greely, who was rich, and he flourished mightily. Then for years he was heard of no more. His pictures are again in the papers but now as old and poor and moving to prevent paying rent. His wife is dead, her fortune spent, and he and his two daughters are struggling to live.

2. During the past winter, no one in society in Washington has been so much talked about as the young Countess Cassini, niece of the Russian Ambassador. The particular thing talked about is the wonderful variety and style of hats that she wears, designing them herself. Just before Easter she celebrated her twentieth birthday by a party at which all the ladies wore headdresses of the olden times.

Dillon was suspended by a vote of two hundred and fortyeight to forty-eight.

Kentucky girls are famous the world over, and the last one to come into public notice is Miss Lotta Greenup, the seventeen-year-old daughter of Judge Greenup, of Paducah. Her father is making speeches in his campaign to get the nomination for Congress, and she accompanies him and at every meeting plays a number of selections on the violin, opening and closing with "Dixie."

6. One of the discomforts of being rich, when one has a family of children, is the danger of having them kidnapped and held for ransom. Recently A. R. Peacock, a multi-millionaire of Pittsburg, Pa., gave up his fine home in that city and came to New York to escape from kidnappers who threatened to steal Mr. Peacock's three children unless he paid them $25,000. The children were guarded by detectives in New York, and have now been placed in a school where they are under the eyes of their teachers at all hours. teachers at all hours.

25. Every rich man seems to feel the necessity of having a yacht among his various pleasure vehicles, and Mr. Frank J. Gould, of New York, aged twenty-four, who came into ten millions from his father's estate when he was twenty-one, and took to himself a wife about six months ago (Miss Helen Kelly of New York, aged eighteen), has recently launched his new yacht "Helenita," so named for his wife. Her picture herewith shows her to be a very hand-some young woman, and both she and her hus-band are fonder of each other and the plain things than they are of society.

26. Within a very few years the game of golf has spread all over the United States and it is now one of our most popular sports. It is an ancient Scotch game. The United States Golf Association has recently elected as its President, Mr. R. H. Robertson, a New York architect, and a good player, though not a champion.

27. During the illness of the President's son, Theodore, at the Groton school, Miss Helena Ethel Ciscle, a little twelve-year-old girl of Baltimore, Md., wrote and mailed a poem to Mr. Roosevelt which so pleased him that he sent a letter of thanks to her. It is needless to say she will cherish the letter always, even though she may become one of our great poetesses. . . .

28. The most noted philanthropist in America, if not in the world, is Andrew Carnegie, an American born in Scotland, and beginning life as a poor boy at three dollars a week. He retired from business several years ago with over two hundred and fifty millions of dollars, made in the iron business and has been giving made in the iron business, and has been giving his money away for libraries all over the coun-try by the millions, his last gift being ten millions to the government to establish a national scientific school at Washington. There are very many people who think Mr. Carnegie could do much better with his money than by founding libraries with it.

29. Probably the most widely-known police officer in the United States is William S. Devery, former Chief of the New York police force. And Chief Devery's fame was not creditable to him, for all kinds of charges were made against him for getting money from violators of the law. Whether the charges were true or not, he has brought himself into notice since leaving his office by buying property at auction to the value of $377,500.

30. Our American girls are leaders among foreigners in whatever field they attempt, and the latest to appear at the front is Miss Ann West Shaw, a St. Louis girl of twenty, who has secured an order to paint a portrait of the Queen of England. Miss Shaw, though so young, has painted the portraits of many notable English women, and this portrait of the Queen will crown her ambition. She inherits her talent, being a grandniece of Benjamin West, one of the greatest of American painters. painters.

31. No song written in the United States is better known than "Ben Bolt," which was given a new life and popularity by the novel "Trilby." But not so many persons know who its author was. ### THE HOME WORKERS COMFORT.

Modern Lace-Making.

ACE is made the world over, it is a very old art, one that has flourished for centuries and then waned only to be revived again. More than one million people in Europe earn their living by their needles. In Belgium alone there are nine hundred lace schools. Of all valuable collections of lace, Pope Leo, who has always encouraged the art, owns probably the most notable in the world, its value approximating a million dollars. a million dollars.

European laces are always very expensive on this side of the water, only a few can afford to buy the quantity which Fashion now demands. The vogue for lace in an endless variety of dainty dress accessories, such as neckties, turnover collars, yokes, jackets, vests, handkerchiefs, lapels and revers is now at its height. It is being used more extensively for all kinds of ornamentation than ever before, and our women are just beginning to realize the possibilities of this line of decoration, and with realization comes the desire to learn to make it as thoroughly as possible. With many it is simply pastime or rest work, and as the work proceeds slowly the temptation is to hurry or slight it, but each little stitch must be put in faithfully or the finished piece will only be a disappointment. European laces are always very expensive on slight it, but each little stitch must be put in faithfully or the finished piece will only be a disappointment.

For the benefit of those of our readers who wish to take up lace-making and have had no instruction, we give a number of illustrations showing plainly how the simpler stitches are put in, then we also present a few practical and simple designs, for more advanced workers, which will add a touch of daintiness to any gown. The designs used for our illustrations are both varied and pleasing and the woman would be difficult to suit who does not find one or more to meet her needs.

It may be well to give a few hints on lace making in general. It is such a delightful occupation that a skilled work-woman wonders how any one can hurry through such a pleasant task bestowing neither care nor pains.

A beginner should choose patterns in which the stitches are often repeated as they are easier to manage than where the stitches change. In this way one learns thoroughly and after making a few of each, the work becomes mechanical and goes easily on. Once master a stitch and it is not soon forgotten. The main essential in lacemaking by amateurs are thoroughness and neatness. Beautiful edgings which are almost impossible to wear out, can easily be made and are good practice before more complicated designs are undertaken. The braids most generally used in this work are Honiton, Russian, Duchesse, Italian, Marie Antoinette etc., and can now be purchased at any store where materials for fancy work are sold.

After selecting your cambric pattern baste it onto a piece of oilcloth to keep it firm and smooth. In doing this take small back stitches in the open edge of the braid and on the outer edge of the braid exactly and securely in place and prevents it from curling up.

In basting on the braid, knots and fastenings should be left on the under side of the pattern as otherwise they greatly interfere with the work. Some lace workers use the hoop in putting in the filling-in stitches and the work is usually smoother when it

To make the quilt, cut pieces of cotton doth fourteen inches square. Have as many of thee as will make a quilt of the size desired. Base one thickness of cotton batting onto each piece and then baste on your pieces of silk, being careful to turn the edges in deep enough so they won't work out with wear. Arrange your pieces of silk on all of the squares except four, which are for the corners. Make four one-fourth circles of black satin, about four inches wide and baste onto the four squares. Take your longest pieces of silk or ribbon and lay them in lengthwise strips from the inside of this piece of satin to the corner. Then last on a piece of black satin to fit this corner, and so cover the ends of the strips, which resemble the sticks of a fan. In the remaining corner fill in with small pieces of silk.

When all the blocks are basted, work all the basted edges with fancy stitches, and embroider or paint or applique something on as many of the plain pieces of silk as you have a desire to. It is suggested that the sticks of the fan be blind-stitched, instead of fancy stitched, as the resemblance to a fan is

This work is easy to do and also very pretty and effective. Illustration 2 is a doily and No. 3 represents top for the new oblong pin cushions, which at present are so popular. When made of fine thread and placed over a silk cushion it is very handsome; one can either finish simply with bows of ribbon on the ends, or with full ruffle of silk of ribbon on the ends, or with full ruffle of silk terror almost escaped from her lips, and for a single instant her presence of mind forsook her. The major had, mean while, given some rapid orders to the officers.

In illustration No. 1 we have the wheel which is used in both designs. The doily consisting of 7 of these, is made by joining the picots in the manner illustrated.

"Hunt him out," said he; "I wouldn't lose my hold on him for the value of a dozen ordinary rebels. If necessary, set the whole regiment to work."

"Gentlemen gentlemen" gried Possin great

"Gentlemen, gentlemen," cried Rose in great apparent consternation, as she unseen, unclasped a bracelet from her arm and flung it far over head into the shubbery, "gentlemen, I've lost my bracelet—a valued bracelet. Five minutes ago I had it on my arm. Major Cleveland—Captain Arbald—I beseach you to search for it. What could have become of it?"

This outbreak arrested the departure of the young officers, who had started to execute the orders of their superior.

"Gentlemen, I implore you to search for it. Major, it may have dropped in the bower. Go look for it, sir. Captain Arbald and Lieutenant Marvin, why do you stand idly there? Do you refuse to search for my jewel? I've lost my bracelet, I tell you, sirs. Is this the way you attend upon the wishes of a lady?"

"Really," broke in Cleveland, "duty—"

"Don't talk to me of duty, sir. I would not lose my bracelet for the wealth of the world. A valued token from a dear friend; I swore never to part with it. I tell you I value that bracelet with my very life."

"But the escaped prisoner, Miss Elsworth," interrupted Major Cleveland, who was not willing to lose the hold he fancied he possessed upon Rose by any act of opposition to her will, while at the same time he felt himself imperatively urged to secure the escaped rebel.

"What is the prisoner to me," passionately

"What is the prisoner to me," passionately exclaimed Rose, "what is he to my bracelet? Must I lose my bracelet for the sake of a runa-way rebel—a miserable clown who may either hang or run, I care not. Some one will tread upon my bracelet. I would not lose it for worlds."

"Indeed, Miss Elsworth, I assure youinterrupted Arbald.

"Indeed, Miss Elsworth, I assure you—" interrupted Arbald.

"Oh, no assurance, sir," turning upon the captain like a tigress; "where is your devotion to me? Where your willingness to sacrifice everything for me, as I have heard you swear more than once? If you ever expect to come into my presence again, you must first clasp that bracelet on my arm. I will hear nothing, listen to no excuse, and if you refuse to obey me, never let me see you again."

Major Cleveland saw his great object in danger and hastened to retrieve matters.

"Gentlemen," said he, "do you remain with Miss Elsworth, and search for the missing jewel. I will myself give the necessary order for the search for the missing prisoner." He lifted his hat to Rose, and walked away.

Rose immediately dispatched the young officers in different directions, and no sooner was she unobserved than she darted into the shrubbery in the direction she had seen Walter gliding avery. He was powere the search to "Do not mention this to him, major." For my sake you will keep your pledge."

"As you wish, my dear Miss Elsworth."
The promise obtained from the major was in view of a bold and daring plan vaguely and dimly forming in her mind. Inasmuch as Captain Armstrong could only be saved by some desperate means, her quick wit had suggested the way it might be done—through the medium of the spell she held over Cleveland, and by an act which though she shrunk from performing, she yet was resolved to attempt. She had adroitly drawn a promise from the guard posted there. The shrubbery here was dense, consisting of thickly tangled lilac bushes, snowballs, a few evergreen and the like. In the midst of these bushes, thickly screened in front by dense spruces, the captain lay prostrate upon the ground. Through the bushes he saw Rose and whispered her name. The light by this time had nearly faded out of the west, but there was a full moon, riding clearly and directly above their heads. The moonlight rendered the open walks almost as bright as day, but the shadows were dense and black.

black.
"They are searching for me with torches, Rose," whispered Walter, "and will be sure to find me. Is there no opening by which I can glide through to the forest?"

Rose looked around. Not a chance seemed to offer.

Rose looked around. Not a chance seemed to offer.

"No, Walter," said she, "but I might get you to the house. There you could effect a disguise."

"We must, at least, try it," was the reply. "I saw your bracelet trick, dear Rose, and found it for you, before I crawled away. Why it is the very one I gave, and had a kiss for once."

"Hush!" muttered Rose: "be cautious, Wal-the very one I gave, and had a kiss for once."

"Hush!" muttered Rose; "be cautious, Walter, I implore you!"

Rose and Walter succeeded in getting to the shadowed side of the house unobserved; but between the screenwork of shrubbery through which they had forced their way, an open space was to be crossed—a space in shadow, to be sure, but dangerous and exposed, nevertheless. After a consultation, they made an attempt to cross, but at an unfortunate moment. They had not run a dozen yards, before a whole party of soldiery with torches came rushing around the corner of the house—among them Major Cleveland. Walter turned and darted back, but he was seen and a rush made in the direction he disappeared. Several shots were fired, and the clamor that arose was startling. The whole scene, indeed, was wild and picturesque.

Rose stood spellbound, with palpitating heart, looking at the scene. The power to move seemed to be suspended. Her cheek looked blanched even in the darkness in which she stood. Suddenly a voice fell upon her ear, close at her side. She started, and looked up. Major Cleveland's face was bending over her shoulder.

"What am I to think, Miss Elsworth?" said

Major Cleveland 5 and shoulder. "What am I to think, Miss Elsworth?" said he. "I find you assisting at this fellow's es-

he. "I find you assisting at this fellow's escape."

"Think!" exclaimed Rose, vehemently, "that I would give the world for Captain Armstrong's escape."

"Humph! That would be a useless gift. Look and see for yourself."

The major pointed to where the torches had congregated, and were swaying to and fro in the struggle of the capture. In a few moments more, a party of a dozen soldiers came crashing through the shubbery, dragging the unfortunate Walter a prisoner in their midst.

"Great Heaven!" cried Rose, burying her face in her hands.

"How's this, Miss Elsworth?" whispered the major in her ear. She started and stared at him proudly, with all her self possession regained.

the major in her ear. She started and stared at him proudly, with all her self possession regained.

"I rejoice that we meet again," said Cleveland, lifting his hat with mock politeness to Walter, as the party came up. Walter shook off the hands that were upon him, and folded his arms in silent disdain. As he did so something glittering dropped upon the grass at his feet. A soldier picked it up, and stepped forward to present it to the major. As Cleveland received it, he started with undisguised surprise. It was the very bracelet he had seen on Rose's arm and the one she had lost, and for the discovery of which she was so clamorous. A light broke upon the major's mind. He began to divine matters. A torch was at his elbow. He held the jewel to the flame, and read the inscription—"To Rose, From Walter." He smiled, though at heart deeply chagrined and enraged, and stepping up to Rose, extended the bracelet to her.

"I am glad, my dear Miss Elsworth, to be the means of restoring this valued token from a dear friend. Would it not be a strange vicissitude if the finding of the trinket should be the means of losing the friend?"

Rose violently compressed her lips, but did not reply. The major whispered an order, and Walter was led off to his former quarters. Rose stood with tightly clasped hands her eyes following the cortege. Cleveland uttered her name in a low tone, when, starting from her reverie, she turned upon him fiercely:

"Major Cleveland, Captain Armstrong must be allowed to go free. I have your promise. I hold you to it. He must—he shall be free!"

"My promise, madam?"

"Look!" exclaimed she vehemently, holding up her hand and pointing to the ring he had given her in the bower.

"Aha! I was beginning to suspect the trick!"

"Your shrewdness would have done you more credit if you had detected it before. As it is, I have your signet and your promise to save Captain Armstrong!"

"But the promise referred only to your husband."

"Gaptain Armstrong is my betrothed hus-

"But the promise referred only to your husband."
"Captain Armstrong is my betrothed husband."

"Aye, but at present is a prisoner. You see, madam, I hold the trump card."
"Your pardon, sir, but I have the game."
"Eh! Is not the captain in my hands?"
"Before tomorrow morning he shall be in mine. "Confound it, madam," exclaimed the major, allowing his rage to escape, "I'll keep so strict a guard upon him, a fly sha'n't light upon him without my knowing of it."

"Do so, and if you were argus-eyed into the bargain, I'd marry him before tomorrow morning."

ing."
"Ha, is it come to that? I'll march this hour."

"Ha, is it come to that? I'll march this nour."
"It would be too late."
"This moment, then."
"I would anticipate you." Could any one have seen the blaze and flash in Rose's eyes during this scene, he would have remembered it to his dying moment. She was superb, beautiful, grand, in the full sway of her reckless, vehement purpose.
"Madam," exclaimed the major, astounded at what appeared her audacity, "you talk idly."

"Madam," exclaimed the major, astounded at what appeared her audacity, "you talk idly." "Sir, you talk without reason." "Why, madam, I'll go to him at once, put a pistol to his head, blow his brains out—" "And make me his widow!" "Deuce take it, you're mad!" "Mad, if you will, Major Cleveland. It is a struggle between us. Look to it, sir. You may be bold, valorous, cunning, but you have a woman's wit against you, so look to it." "A challenge, Miss Elsworth?" "A challenge, Major Cleveland!" (TO BE CONTINUED.)

CHAPTER II.

The opening chapter of this intensely interesting story appeared in May Comfort. Back numbers may be obtained by enclosing two cents to Comfort, Augusta, Maine, for each number desired.

"I COULD PUT MY FINGER ON THE MAN, BUT I WON'T.

HEW!" blew the big high sheriff of Walton county through his red whiskers. He slicked the perspiration from his forehead with his fingers.

The time was three o'clock of the afternoon following the day of the disappearance of Squire Caleb Brett of Mansfield village. The sheriff was standing in the broad doorway of the Purinton Mill. Round about the door, along the fences in the locality and in scattered knots in the upper section of the establishment were townspeople and strangers who had been attracted to the place, newspaper reporters and anxious men of affairs from distant cities, men whose business dealings with Squire Brett were left uncomfortably in the lurch by his mysterious taking-off.

The sheriff had arrived in the early dawn and had led the search. From the mill, after the old structure had been ransacked in all its parts, the quest extended to the fields, pastures and the waters. The water was drawn out of the mill's pond, the brook was searched and boats patrolled the salt water bay. Back again to the mill came the sheriff and his satellites and at the starting place he frankly avowed to the crowd standing about that he hadn't the least idea what had become of the Squire-if he were alive-or what disposition had been made of the body, if he were dead.

of the body, if he were dead.

"Keep on hunting, boys," advised the high sheriff. "Maybe you'll dig something up, though it does seem as though we had given this place 'round here a fine-tooth goin' over. I'd stay with you but the county attorney has sent for me to come to the tavern."

The county attorney had unneated his bog sent for me to come to the tavern."

The county attorney had unpacked his bag in a stuffy little bed-room at the village hotel. On top of two law books sat a fat bottle built on the same expansive model as the attorney. "Help yourself, Hiram," he said, and the sheriff prepared himself for the interview.

"Well, what have you done?" the attorney inquired briskly.

"Hunted everywhere, squire," replied the sheriff, wiping his beard with his broad handkerchief.

"Have you been all through the mill base."

"Have you been all through the mill basement to see if the dirt has been disturbed?"
"Been over every square inch with lanterns."
"Not a clue, then?"

"Not a clue, then?"

The sheriff unrolled some articles from a piece of newspaper. They were the battered beaver hat of Squire Brett and the piece of peeled orange that had been found on the top of the slab pile. "Those seem to be the only things the Squire saw fit to leave, except ye reckon in them snips of cloth sticking to the slivers in the sluice."

The two men sat for a space and looked at each other. Then the sheriff, giving the attorney a keen look, remarked:
"You've probably heard more of less of the talk that's flyin' round?"
"Sure."

"What do you think of it?"

The prosecuting attorney squinted one eye at the sheriff. "You say," he remarked enigmatithe sheriff. "You say," he remarked enigmatically.

"Well, this is 'tween you and me and the bedpost there," the sheriff said rather hesitatingly, "and I don't want to start in jumping at conclusions or suspecting my own neighbors, as you might say, but—"

"What you mean is that at least three persons here in this town were a little too closely bunched up with the Squire along about half past ten yesterday?"

The sheriff leaned back, stretched his right leg and drew a long slab of tobacco from his trousers' pocket. "That's nigh enough to what I'm thinkin'," he replied.

"Now, Hiram, we are alone and we can talk

"Now, Hiram, we are alone and we can talk plainly. How do you figure it? Accident or suicide or murder?"

suicide or murder?"

"Old Cale Brett never committed suicide in the Lord's world," the sheriff snapped. "As to accident—wal, he might have tumbled down there, but most of us know the Squire too well there, but most of us know the Squire too well to size it up that way. And then again the body was moved—hid."

"That's the singular part of it," broke in the attorney. "Supposing any one had an interest in pushing the Squire down that sluice, why didn't they push and then let well enough alone? With the body on the slab pile the accident theory would have been a hard one to disprove."

"You never can tell what the chief operator

"You never can tell what the chief operator in such a case will do," said the sheriff. "There was the Walker case in Monburn. Some one killed old Gus Walker in his barn, left the pistol to indicate that the old man had done it pistol to indicate that the old han had took a forkful of hay and carefully dumped it over the corpse. You see you can't reckon on what a green hand at the murder bus'ness will act

"Has the family any suspicions?" asked the attorney.

"The women folks are too much broken up to say a word," said the sheriff. "Last night George Brett was on a toot and today he's on his high and mighty; says he don't know anything about the case, and don't want to have any officers chasing him 'round and bothering him with questions."

"To-o-o-de-do-o-o!" vocalized the lawyer.

"Latest edict from the Prince de Mansfield! "Latest edict from the Prince de Mansfield! Well, George Brett can run the grand balls over to the Corner and he can boss the bartender at the Oriental hotel and can make certain women stand around but he can't tell the officers of this county what to do."
"Well, you can make him talk when he is under oath at the coroner's inquest. That's the only way to drag evidence out of some of these suckers around here. They won't talk straight unless they are on the witness stand."
"How in Tophet are you going to call a coroner's inquest without a body to view," demanded the attorney. "We haven't proved death yet."

death yet."
"That's so," murmured the sheriff, somewhat abashed. "I've got so used to thinkin' that the Squire is dead I've forgotten all about we haven't found the remains." He looked regretfully on the jammed hat and the orange.
"You can't even arrest any one for murdering the old man till we prove that he's been murdered, eh?" added the sheriff.

murdered, eh?" added the sheriff.

"We can arrest if there are reasonable grounds for suspicion but there's a provision in the law regarding corpus delictum that a shrewd lawyer for the defense would be sure to take advantage of. That is, a man can't be convicted of murdering another man until some portion of the victim's body has been found."

"And both don't sweet" "sweet"

"And hats don't count," remarked the sheriff slab pile and from his wallet produced one of the snips that he had pulled from a sliver in the sluice. Minute as was this fragment there was no mistaking that both pieces had come from the same weave of cloth. Therefore it might be concluded that in some way the Squire's body had come in contact with the spikes in that beam. The relative positions of sluice and beam precluded the possibility that the body could have struck the spikes in the downward rush. Was it raised afterwards and hung on these spikes for temporary concealment? The detective indulged his suspicions and reserved his conclusions. and reserved his conclusions.

and reserved his conclusions.
Then day after day he proceeded on his quest for information among the people of the town. He held many conferences with the heart-broken women of the Brett family and to them as his employers explained his progress. Mrs. Erskine still hoped desperately that her father was alive. It was this hope, vain as it was, that Erskine still hoped desperately that her father was alive. It was this hope, vain as it was, that had provoked a bitter quarrel with George Brett, one of the three heirs to the large Brett property. At first Mrs. Erskine kept the knowledge of this dispute from the detective. It was as though she were afraid to reveal her suspicions. And if suspicion had grown in her mind she was at the first unquestionably willing to sacrifice her desire for vengeance to her pride in the honor of the family.

Despite Detective Ordwell's unvarying rule

Despite Detective Ordwell's unvarying rule to search all motives and glean all information before allowing his prejudices or opinions to get at work, he found his suspicions leaning more and more toward George Brett. He had discovered that since his uncle, the Squire, had established him in business at Mansfield Corper the young man had been leading the round. ner the young man had been leading the rapid life of "the rural sport." His affairs were in such shape that his creditors would have closed his store were it not for the fact that he would one day come into a share of the Squire's estate.

It was known to every one in town that durit was known to every one in town that during the few weeks before the Squire's disappearance he and his nephew had been having a bitter quarrel over the woman George wanted to marry. She was a flashy girl whose employment had been in the cloth hall of the local woolen mill. Her reputation was not of the sort to be tolerated by the Brett family and the Squire had declared that George must forselve her or he disipherited. The roune man "It is one of the cases, Hiram," said the sake her or be disinherited. The young man county attorney, replacing his law books and while in his cups had discussed the affair in

"Appears to be pretty certain that his uncle is dead, eh?" said the detective grimly.

"Isn't it horrible, Mr. Ordwell? He says he needs money badly and must have it. He vows that he will marry that girl, even though his uncle's last demand was that he should give her up. He has raved at me and threatened me until I am nigh distracted. The last time he was here he said that he had married the girl secretly some time ago. Perhaps that was why he was so persistent in fighting his uncle's wishes."

wishes."
"I have found out that the marriage actually took place some time ago in New Hampshire," said the detective.

Mrs. Erskine's face grew white. "I am willing to stand by my family and kin until the last ditch," she said, "but when a member insults and disgraces the rest of us it is only fair to retaliate. There is one thing that I have not told you, Mr. Ordwell, for I hoped that the suspicion of this crime might be diverted from George—and—and others."

George—and—and others."

"If you want this case ferreted out, Mrs. Erskine, I think I ought to have your full confidence. If not—"

"I shall be party to no step to hide a crime, Mr. Ordwell. The last time George was at the house he left in a great passion because I would not hasten matters to a division of the property. On his way to his team he met Grace in the path. 'I want you,' he said 'to prevail on your mother to settle up this property matter. Uncle is dead and I won't be kept out of my money any longer!' Grace told him there was no proof of the Squire's death. 'He's dead,' George repeated, angrily. He had been drinking that day and perhaps he said things that he didn't intend to let out."

"Drunken men lie and bluff quite as often as they confess," commented the detective dryly. "But go on."

"'He's dead,' he repeated. 'I'm sure of it for I know who killed him. I can place my finger on the man in ten minutes, my dear cousin, and if I should do so it would tear your hear into inch pieces. There are two reasons why I don't want to lead the sheriff up to the man. In the first place he did a trick that has helped me out of a tight place. I'm always grateful whatever else I am. In the second place, my dear Grace, I don't want to hurt your love affairs. I know what it is to be in love and have things go wrong. Understand, eh? But mind ye, you swing your mother into line or I'll forget that lovers ought to stand together, and I'LL PUT MY FINGER ON THE MAN THAT KILLED UNCLE BRETT!'" They occupy such positions in this community that the law mustn't even blow the breath of suspicion on their good fame just now. Keep at work and consult me every day."

During the next twenty-four hours these matters had been accomplished: the town of Mansfield had offered a reward of $500, supplemented by another $500 from the Brett family, "for any information leading to detection of the person or persons who removed the body of Caleb Brett from Purinton's mill on the 24th day of June." day of June." It was thought best not to allege foul play at first.

Within twenty-four hours, several state detectives, as these licensed constables are termed, were at work as volunteers, their expectation of recompense the reward. A dozen newspaper reporters from big city papers were skirmishing over town with equal zeal and half the people of Mansfield had constituted themselves detectives pro tem. Advised by a lawyer in a near-by city, in whose hands Mrs. Erskine and Grace had placed their affairs, Thomas Ordwell, licensed state detective, was employed by the family. Ordwell was spare and sallow and as matter of fact as a book agent. He didn't disguise the circumstance that he was a detective and he went about his work as regularly each day as though he were an apple tree ularly each day as though he were an apple tree spent two days in examination of the mill and its immediate surroundings. Every time he came on the upper floor he looked at the myriad footprints in the dust about the mouth of the sluice and sighed. The whole story of the struggle, if struggle there had been, would have been clearly told in signs had he been the first man to enter that mill when the search for Sonire Brett commenced, so he pondered.

Squire Brett commenced, so he pondered.
On the second day of the search the detective was sitting on top of the slab pile with a lantern between his legs. He was alone and was looking about him and meditating. How and where?

He stood up and raised the lantern. The height of the slab pile lifted him close against the beams supporting the flooring. The beams were huge stringers and here and there from them projected the ends of rusty spikes. From one of these spikes he pulled a frayed remnant of cloth. Twas worsted. He sat down on the

The Squire had been almost as open in inform-The Squire had been almost as open in informing his friends that his nephew should be forced to break away from the entanglement. It was an open secret that on the forenoon of the tragedy George Brett had driven over to Mansfield village to have one final talk with his uncle. The old man had declared previously to the family that unless his nephew ceased all communication with the girl before the week was over he would make a will cutting him off without a dollar.

Under these circumstances it is not surprising that Ordwell commenced to find his calm.

ing that Ordwell commenced to find his calm, reasoning powers warped by the scantily veiled hints and accusations of the townspeople.

Under different circumstances, perhaps, the urging hints of the community would have driven the county officers to make an arrest. But the position of George Brett, unwillingness of the high sheriff to prejudice himself in his candidacy for a second term by pre-cipitateness and the general disposition to be slow and sure in charging people with crime in a New England rural community, all tended to hold matters off. But after nearly four weeks of work the de-tective came to the Brett residence one evening and announced to the mother and daughter that he was ready to make his final report.

Mrs. Erskine listened, pale and anxious.

"I am not," he replied. "I feel that I have secured every available bit of information bearing on this case, so far as I am able to dig it out by my own agency. You have employed me and I therefore turn it over to you. If now you desire to retain me longer and have me cooperate with the authorities, that is for you to say."
"I certainly do," said Mrs. Erskine. "Grace and I both feel that we cannot rest until everything is done that money and work can accomplish."

thing is done that money and work can accomplish."

"With the amount of information at hand up to this time, madam," said Ordwell, "I don't think I would be justified in saying that I have arrived at any conclusions. I prefer to be on the safer side, especially since I feel I ought to inform you that the reputation of one of your family is seriously compromised."

James Whitcomb Riley. The People's Poet and His Work.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

O have written that which has appealed to the hearts of the com-mon people as well as to those in the higher walks of life is worth much. To James Whitcomb Riley, the "Hoosier poet," has been poet," has been given this pleas-ure and distinc-tion. He has had his largest and most appreciative audience a mong the rank and file of his countrymen. And yet he has not lacked readers and admirers among those in the higher walks of life and those of the highest intellec-

Very few writers have attained the high degree of success attained by James Whitcomb Riley without any special experience or training for literary work.

He was born in Greenfield, Indiana, in the year 1852. His father was an attorney who traveled about the country taking his boy with him on many of his journeys when other boys of his age were in school. of his age were in school.

In this way the boy acquired a roving dis-position and soon became restless when compelled to remain long in one place. His after life gave proof of the fact that the boy was alert in his journeyings and that his youthful alert in his journeyings and that his youthful mind received impressions that were of value to him in the literary career he chose when his wandering was done.

When he was yet in his teens young Riley left school to adopt the nomadic career of a wandering sign writer, and later on he became connected with a strolling theatrical company for which he wrote songs and re-cast plays beside appearing in the various dramas and farces given by the company in the small western given by the company in the small western towns.

It was about the year 1875 when Riley began to contribute poems in western dialect to the local papers.

These early efforts found many admirers and were widely copied and led to the young poet becoming regularly connected with the Indian-apolis Journal. Many of his best poems have appeared in this paper and his reputation has been made while writing for the great popular audience the newspaper gives its contributors. Few authors can read their own compositions as Mr. Riley reads his, and no one can give some of his poems as he gives them. His delivery of some of them is so delightfully natural and unaffected, so far removed from the manner of the average "elocutionist," and so irresistibly funny that he never fails to please his audience

He is never more pleasing than as an after dinner entertainer. The writer will never forget Riley's rendition of his uproariously funny prose sketch entitled "An Object Lesson."

It was at a little dinner at the Parker House in Boston after Riley had read to an audience completely filling 'Tremont Temple. On this occasion and at a reception given in his honor Riley said that his favorite poem was one of but three stanzas by an unknown author. He prethree stanzas by an unknown author. He pre-ferred reciting it to reciting any of his own poems and I remember that the first verse was as follows:

ollows:

"He'd nothing but his violin,
I'd nothing but my song;
But we were wed when skies were blue
And summer days were long.
We often supped on dewberries,
And slept upon the hay,
And oft at eve the farmers' wives
Came out to hear us play
The dear old songs, the sweet old songs,
We could not want for long
While my man had his violin,
And I my sweet love song."

The moral of the poem is that young people who wait to accumulate wealth before marrying are unwise, for the last lines are—

"They who wait for houses and lands,
For riches and for kine,
Till youth's sweet spring grows brown and sere
And love and beauty tine,
Will never know the joy of hearts
That met without a fear,
When you had but your violin
And I my song, my dear."

While it is undoubtedly his dialect poems that have made James Whitcomb Riley's reputation, many of his other poems strike a high note and have the ring of the true poet. Exquisite in its tenderness and pathos is the little poem entitled "Away" and beginning with the couplet—

"I cannot say, and I will not say That he is dead.—He is just away!"

His poems "Knee-deep in June," "The Old Swimmin' Hole," "Jim" and "Little Orphan Anny" are among the Hoosier poet's best dia-"The Old lect poems. One has only to read them to un-derstand the secret of James Whitcomb Riley's large audiences and the hold he has on the affections of so many of his readers.

CHAPTER I.

CHAPTER I.

RE you asleep, mother? Oh, mother, I am so sorry I disturbed you, but I'm all ready to go for the medicine and the other things!"

"Asleep? Yes—no—perhaps I might have been dozing a little, Flossie, dear."

Mrs. Field sat up among her shabby sofa pillows, passing one hand dreamily across her brow. Yes, she must have been asleep, for it seemed to her that she was back in the leafy lanes of her old country home, with her dead husband walking at her side, and the scarlet foliage of the maples rustling overhead. Not much like this dreariest of tenement rooms with its worn carpet and weather-stained ceiling and the solitary window opening on a brick wall. Was it any marvel that life, also, was gray and cheerless in such surroundings as this?

Involuntarily the tears filled her eyes—but gray and cheerless in such surroundings as this?

Involuntarily the tears filled her eyes—but she strove to smile bravely for the sake of the daughter, who stood before the cracked mirror, adjusting her hat,—a pretty, slender girl, with large blue-gray eyes fringed with thick, dark lashes and a complexion like a rose.

"I do think, mother," said Flossie Field. speaking with a hat-pin in her mouth, "that it's a positive disgrace for old Wurtemburg to give us such a glass as this, all dim and distorted, and a big crack down the middle, too! Why, it isn't fit for a second-hand shop! I mean to speak to her about it!"

"Don't, dear," pleaded Mrs. Field, apprehensively. "It is two weeks since we have paid her anything and she didn't speak to me when she passed me on the stairs this morning."

"Ill-mannered old thing," said Flossie. "I'd have made her speak. We're going to pay her, aren't we, when the money for this embroidery comes? Now, mother, am I all right?"

Involuntarily Mrs. Field's care-worn countenance turned, smiling and dimpling, towards her. It was as if a sunbeam had burst from the gray sky overhead, illuminating all the dreary room.

"But, Flossie—I wouldn't wear those scarlet quills in my hat if I were you," she hesitated. "Why not, mother?" And Flossie turned a wondering gaze to the blurred glass, then back again.

"It—it makes the hat rather showy, don't it?

wondering gaze to the blurred glass, then back again.

"It—it makes the hat rather showy, don't it? Where's the black ribbon bow, dear?"

"Oh, mother, and they didn't cost me anything, after all," pleaded Flossie, a shade of disappointment overspreading her face. "Mrs. Joycotte gave them to me. She said they were just the color I ought to wear. I thought it would be such a pleasant surprise to you, and you don't like my poor little red feathers, after all!"

Mrs. Field sighed. In the picturesque head-gear, Flossie's bright young beauty only glowed more radiantly. It was the dimpled face, with its tendrils of beech-brown hair and liquid, dark-lashed eyes that was noticeable, not the vivid plumes. In a nun's coif, Flossie Field would have attracted equal attention.

"Shall I change them, mother?" asked the "Shall I change them, mother?" asked the girl.

"No, keep them on, darling. After all they are pretty, and why shouldn't my little girl look as well as the others?" said Mrs. Field, striving to smile.

"I am so glad!" chirped Flossie. "I do like the red quills, and the rest of my outfit is rather shabby. If ever lam rich—"She stopped abruptly. "But, mother, do you think we shall ever be very rich?"

"No. Flossie. I don't think we ever shall."

"No, Flossie, I don't think we ever shall," sighed Mrs. Field. "But here is Mrs. Joycotte's parcel. Don't be long. I think there is snow in the air."

Flossie stooped and left a light kiss on her

Flossie stooped and left a light kiss on her mother's brow, a poor care-worn brow all traversed with fine wrinkles, and ran down stairs. Mrs. Field looked sadly after her.

"I think," she mused, "that the child grows prettier every day. "I cannot feel easy to have her out alone in the streets; and yet what is there to fear? Mr. Joycotte says I ought to trust more in Providence, but Mr. Joycotte has never been tried as I have. Flossie is so young and beautiful. Oh, if I could only be sure of what Heaven has in store for her?"

While poor Naomi Field fretted herself into a fever over life's possibilities, Flossie tripped lightly along the streets, carrying the needlework on which both mother and daughter had been toiling for long days,—a table scarf which Mrs. Joycotte, the minister's wife, had ordered for some wealthy parishioner. It was a raw

Mrs. Joycotte, the minister's wife, had ordered for some wealthy parishioner. It was a raw December day and the girl's poor little gray cloak was sadly insufficient to ward off the biting wind. But Flossie was young, with the blood dancing in her veins like wine, and as she walked swiftly along, she could have sung and danced through the year joyd life. blood dancing in her veins like wine, and as she walked swiftly along, she could have sung and danced through the very joy of life. How gay the streets were, how musical the rumble of carriage wheels. Oh, to be rich, to dwell in houses like these—to wear silken garments and ride in luxurious carriages, for little Flossie had a good deal of Mother Eve in her composition! A girl with a face like hers, however, could scarcely evade unpleasant observation, and more than once she nervously quickened her pace when a bold passer riveted his gaze on her bright cheeks with too evident admiration. She did not like people to stare, yet how was she to avoid it?

As she drew near the great Music Hall on Fifty Seventh Street, her quick glance per-ceived an oblong slip of paper lying as if it had just fallen on the gray expanse of pavement and unconsciously she stooped to pick it up. Did her eyes deceive her, or was it-yes it was—a ticket for a concert at Carnegie Hall on that very day, a ticket for the Paderewski Matinee!

Matinee!

A dark blue victoria, drawn by a highstepping horse and driven by a coachman in sober livery, had just rattled away from the curb. Possibly the ticket had been dropped by the occupant of that nest of satin-cushioned luxury, but Flossie Field saw that it was too late to restore it now, nor, to tell the truth, did she just at first think of restoring it to the rightful owner. She could only reflect on the bliss of having found it. Had she not always longed to see the inside of this Palace of Music?

I've no fault to find with the present arrangement."

He stooped and, picking up the fallen orchids, laid them on her lap.

"Do you like Paderewski?" he asked.

"I don't know whether I do or not," said Flossie, while in her heart she was saying to herself: "It must have been her ticket that I found. I wonder if they can arrest me for stealing! Oh. I wish, I wish I hadn't come!"

"Who on earth can she be?" thought the handsome stranger. "And how came she here?

Had she not yearned, with a yearning beyond description, to hear the great Paderewski? And not for a second did Flossie doubt that this ticket was her own by the primal right of discovery!

A hurried glance at the clock in a neighboring jeweler's window told her that the hour for the concert was very near, and our little heroine flew like the wind to Mrs. Joycotte's house with her parcel.

"Not at home? Well, it don't matter," said breathless Flossie. "I'll leave the scarf and call again.

The sour-faced old servant looked askance at The sour-faced old servant looked askance at Flossie's bright eyes and glowing cheeks as she took the bundle. This new protegee of Mrs. Joycotte's was far too pretty for her mind. Half an hour afterward Flossie found herself seated in a box on the third tier of the glittering semi-circle at Carnegie Hall, surreptitiously with the property of the property of the grant of the semi-circle at Carnegie Hall, surreptitiously with the property of the semi-circle at Carnegie Hall, surreptitiously with the property of the semi-circle at Carnegie Hall, surreptitiously with the semi-circle at Carnegie Hall, surreptitiou nibbling a bun, while her heart pulsed wildly with the haste she had made, partly, also, with triumph at finding herself in so novel and delightful a position.

"Mother will be uneasy about me," thought she, "but there was no time to tell her, and how pleased she will be when she hears of my ad-venture!"

venture!"
But as the big hall began to fill and the huge vacant spaces became packed with brilliant humanity, Flossie Field grew uneasy.
"I wish people wouldn't stare so much," thought she as she edged behind the boxcurtain. "I don't see why they are so rude."
For it never occurred to her how unlike she was to the rest of the gay throng, in her plain brown serge grown and cotton gloves, to say nothing of the dimpled freshness of her face, with its Madonna curves and long-lashed eyes. Suddenly the doorway in the rear was dark-Suddenly the doorway in the rear was dark-ened by a swift shadow, the curtain was lifted, Upon my word, this is the strangest adventure I ever stumbled across!"

At this instant, however, a breath of divine music stole like a spell across the silence, and as the heavenly phrases followed one another with ever-increasing volume, Flossie leaned forward with clasped hands and cheeks aflame, the young man watching her the while. At the close of the first number he spoke again. "You are fond of music?"
The spell of the melody had freed Flossie's tongue.

"Oh, very fond!" she cried. "But, Paderewski—" She did not complete the sentence.

The brown eyes shone, the cheeks were suffused with vivid rose; she was prettier than

"He's very fine," acknowledged the stranger. "Isn't it queer, though" pausing to fasten a milk-white orchid in his own coat. "I came here expecting to meet quite a different person, and here I am, seated beside you!"

Again Flossie was silent.
"And without in the least knowing who you are.

are."
Still she did not speak.
"Won't you tell me by what name I may call you?" he persisted.
"I—I don't think I ought to."
"Now I am rebuked!" he retorted, lightly.
"But you'll have to. It's Kismet. Do you know, I had my fortune told this morning by an old hag on Herald Square. I was to meet my fate today. I didn't believe it then, but I do now."

"Hush!" Flossie lifted her finger as the pianist once more crossed the stage. She wished the man would stop talking. She knew wished the man would stop talking. She knew now that she had made a mistake in being here at all, still more in allowing a stranger to sit beside her and address her. All her mother's warnings recurred to her and her poor little frightened heart fluttered wildly.

"Oh, if 1 only were at home again!" she thought.

thought.

The electric lights, the diamonds, the brilliant toilettes swam before her eyes the dreamy, rocking refrain of the "Minuet" sounded far away and indistinct, and it was not until the audience rose en masse, that she knew the concert was over. She started up.

"You have dropped the flowers again," said the low, soft voice of her companion.

"I don't want the flowers," almost sobbed the girl. "I'm in a hurry."

"No, don't be in haste," smiled the gentle-

"I don't know," said Flossie. "Please take back your flowers, sir."

Flossie sat silent, wondering if the tall gentleman with the flashing eyes and the heavy black moustache were crazy.
"Don't be frightened," he said, his manner suddenly changing to an exquisite courtesy. "The lady I expected to meet is not here—but I've no fault to find with the present arrangement."

"Hallo!" he exclaimed. "Why it isn't Miss Vaillant at all!"

He rushed to the pavement, looking this way and that. To the left a scarlet spot glowed in the crowd, in the opposite direction another.

the crowd, in the opposite direction another. The young man whistled softly.

"Now, which is it?" he asked himself. "I'm hanged if I know. I may just as well give up the chase and be done with it. But what a beauty she was! And how on earth did she come to be in Hilary Vaillant's box?"

He walked disconsolately through towards Fifth Avenue, while Flossie Field, hurrying breathlessly in quite a different direction, kept thinking: "Oh, what would mother say? That I wasn't to be trusted out of her sight. And she would be right. I have behaved like a silly child. But after all, perhaps he meant to be polite. Why was I so suspicious? I almost wish now that I had brought away the flowers. Mother is so fond of them, and they were so Mother is so fond of them, and they were so beautiful. And, any how, I have heard Pade-rewski play! Mrs. Field shook her head when she heard the story of Flossie's escapade, but it was not in human nature to frown at the pretty young in human nature to frown at the pretty young creature who was so sure of her sympathy.

"But you mustn't do it again, Flossie," said she. "Promise me—never again."

"I promise, mother," assented the girl. "For I was a little frightened—just for an instant, when he looked at me so hard. And now, mother, I'll go to Mrs. Joycotte's for the money."

"No, dear, no. It is growing dusk," said

"No, dear, no. It is growing dusk," said Mrs. Field. "And a young girl like you cannot be too careful."

"But Mrs. Wurtemberg wants the rent."

"Mrs Wurtemberg must wait another day," said Mrs. Field, with gentle firmness. "There are some risks that you must not run, dear child."

are some risks that you must not run, dear child."

"What a dear little care-worn mother you are!" laughed Flossie, but nevertheless her eyes brimmed with loving tears.

Early the next morning she went to the minister's house. Kind Mrs. Joycotte met her at the door.

"Oh. my dear," said she. "I am so sorry, but Mrs. Vannecker has changed her mind and concludes not to take the scarf after all."

Flossie started back in dismay. "Oh, Mrs. Joycotte, and we worked so hard at it, and there's the expense of the materials, too."

"To be sure, my dear," said Mrs. Joycotte.

"And it's a heartless thing for the woman to do, but one never considers other people."

"But what am I to do, Mrs. Joycotte? We need the money so much," pleaded Flossie, with a trembling lip.

Mrs. Joycotte reflected a moment. "Have you five dollars, Flossie?"

"I haven't five cents, Mrs. Joycotte," confessed Flossie, flushing crimson with shame.

"Then I'll lend it to you," said Mrs. Joycotte, taking a new clean bill out of her purse.

"Hush, Flossie, you don't understand. This is only a loan. It will pay your entrance fee at the Art Exchange on Fifth Avenue and you can leave the scarf there on sale. A great many nice people go there,—it's quite exclusive, you see, and when this is sold you can put in something else."

Flossie's face brightened. "Oh, Mrs. Joy-thing else."

Flossie's face brightened. "Oh, Mrs. Joycotte, how can I thank you enough?" cried she.
"And I'll pay you soon as ever I can."
"There is no hurry, child," said the minister's wife, smiling, as she wrote down the address.

ter's wife, smiling, as she wrote down the address.

So it happened that Flossie Field, beaming like a rose, passed under the Persian draped archway of the beautiful Art Exchange on Fifth Avenue, where tall palms drooped and wine-red satin folds hung over the windows and all the shelves and pedestals were crowded with pretty things. As she turned to admire a beautiful piece of tapestry, her elbow struck against a small oil painting—"Moonlight on the Ocean"—and knocked it from its insecure vantage to the floor. As she uttered a little cry of dismay, a gentleman who was leaning against the counter stepped forward and raised it from the floor.

"Oh, what have I done!" she cried. "The frame is broken!"

"Not broken, only fallen apart," said the frame is broken!"

"Not broken, only fallen apart," said the gentleman, courteously. "Pray do not annoy yourself. There is no harm done. The picture is mine, and I can easily set it right."
"Thank you so much," faltered Flossie, but she trembled violently in spite of herself as she turned to the waiting attendant.

she trembled violently in spite of herself as she turned to the waiting attendant.

Mrs. Joycotte's card, with the hurriedly scribbled message, proved an excellent recommendation, and Flossie left the needlework with renewed hopes.

As she turned to leave the Exchange she came face to face with the same young man who had been her companion at the Paderewski Matinee. Involuntarily her face brightened. It was like meeting an old acquaintance. He doffed his hat with smilling welcome.

"I'm glad to see you again, Miss Paderewski," said he lightly. "But you oughtn't to have run away from me so unceremoniously."

Flossie laughed in spite of herself, and just said he lightly. "But you oughtn't to have run away from me so unceremoniously."

Flossie laughed in spite of herself, and just at that moment the gentleman who had rescued the moonlight picture went out raising his hat in response to the other's greeting.
"Who is that gentleman?" she asked eagerly.
"Oh," cried the black-eyed stranger, "so you have a human element of curiosity about you, eh? You are not merely a disembodied spirit!" And as Flossie looked puzzled, he added: "It's a chap I know. Quite an art enthusiast, I believe, in his way."
"Oh, then," said Flossie, "he had painted that picture himself."
"I dare say," assented her companion. "He's rather an experimenter in art and that sort of thing. Why do you look so sober?"
For Flossie did look rather grave. She was saying to herself: "And he wanted to sell it, I suppose. It's hard enough for a woman to be poor—it must be a cruel thing to a man's heart." But she said aloud: "Good morning! I'm rather in haste."
"Mayn't I walk part of the way with you? Really, you know, we are guite ald econsist.

The streets of New York were an unknown riddle to Flossie Field, but by dint of asking many questions she at last received her own many questions she at last reached her own home, starting when a stout gentleman stepped before her, arresting her entrance. "Don't be frightened, Miss Field," said Mrs. Wurtemberg's familiar voice. "It's Mr. Joy-wurtemoerg's familiar voice. "It's Mr. Joycotte, the parson. I didn't know who else to send, and I couldn't shoulder the whole of the responsibility myself, so I got my little boy to go for him."

Flossie glanced up and tried to smile. She had seen Mr. Joycotte a few times before and there was something reassuring in his kind face, and vet-

CONDITIONS.

To have one's hands read in this department, by ligitus, one of the finest living paimists, it is necessary to observe the following conditions:
Impressions of both hands must be sent, fully postpaid and having the name, address and nom de plume of the ender enclosed in the package also.

The package must in every instance be accompanied by the names and addresses of eight new subscribers at venty-five cents each, the whole amount, $2.00 being emitted, with the package, addressed to Comfort Almistry Club, Augusta, Maine.

No notice will be taken of impressions and requests or readings unle s the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

To take impressions, first hold two large vieces of blank for readings unle s the sender has fully complied with the above conditions.

To take impressions, first hold two large pieces of blank paper over a candle or similar flame, until they are heavily coated with the smoke. Then lay these pieces down, smoke side uppermost on a pad of cotton. Now place the two hands, palms downward, one on each sheet of paper, pressing firmly and steadily down, but taking care not to move the hand. Keep them so for one minute and lift carefully, so as not to disturb the impression. Have ready some fixatif, which can be bought at a drug store or an art store or made with gum arabic and water in an atomizer. Spray this over the impressions before they are moved and allow them to dry. Then they are ready to send.

Smoked paper impressions are the best. But if it is desired to send a plaster cast, take plaster of Paris and dissolve in water to the consistency of thick cream. Pour this into a large shallow dish and when it is hardening place the hand, well-greased, palm downward, in the plaster, pressing downward. Several minutes will be required to get this impression and great care must be taken in removing the hand, not to break the plaster. Casts are exceedingly difficult to send without breaking and should be very carefully packed in a box with the name of the sender written on it. Putty is sometimes successfully used in place of plaster. A good photograph if sufficiently well taken to bring out all the times, can also be read, although in all cases the smoked paper is the best, if properly treated with fixatif.

Bear in Mind that all the above conditions must be observed.

Also, that letters not complying with them will go into the waste-basket. Readings cannot appear for several months after impressions are sent.

HERE is a story told of the great French palmist, Desbarrolles, which will be interesting to my readers. It is said that one evening during the prosperity of the Second Empire when its structure seemed be ilt on the rocks and the dynasty of the Bonaparte family firmly established, the French palmist was summoned to Napole-on's headquarters and asked to examine and read the hands of Napoleon III. and the beautiread the hands of Napoleon III. and the beautiful Empress Eugenie. To the surprise of even Desbarrolles himself, the first indication he noticed in the royal palm was the absence of any sign of future greatness and the plain indication of a dreamer, a reckless deceiver and an unprincipled libertine. He saw that the ex-

I have one more hand to read and that belongs to the famous theosophist, writer and lecturer, Annie Besant. The hand of Mrs. Besant shows a very fine organism. It possesses more of magnetic than electric force. The deep, hollow palm denotes eccentricity. There is every indication that her disposition and ambitions in early life were directly opposite to what they now appear. In casting the hand I found that the skin was so moist that it would scarcely accept the plaster. This is a condition invariably found in teachers of the mystic. Her heart action is excellent and her lungs are in good condition. The lower part of the fingers

Her heart action is excellent and her lungs are in good condition. The lower part of the fingers indicate economy in financiering. I should say if occasion demanded, or if she thought occasion demanded, she would be miserly. Her pretense of doing things for the world's good is not as sincere as she would like herself.

Her mentality is exceedingly well developed.

Her mentality is exceedingly well developed. The strongest traits, as shown in the hand, are comparison, calculation and caution. There is comparison, calculation and caution. There is also a marked tendency toward acquisitiveness. The ends of her fingers are exceedingly sensitive, almost as sensitive as those of a blind person. This indicates intuition and is also an invariable characteristic of the psychic mind.

The governmental nerves in the side of the hand show an emphatic and determined nature. There is both logic and will power. She thinks well of her own suggestions and acts immediately upon them. I should not call the hand an artistic one. The owner of such a hand would always strike to lead in some eccentric movement or reform. It would be essential to existence.

Desserts of Small Fruits.

HERE are some persons who always like uncooked fruit. There are others who once in a while fancy it cooked. They grow tired of seeing berries appear in their natural state and long for a change. This change they can very easily have and with little trouble, yet many women seem to think women seem to think that the only way to make a dessert of fruit is to put it into a pie.

Now a pie is a very good thing in its way and when it is well made there are few desserts that taste better. But pies are more or less bother to make, especially in hot weather, and they are not always the most wholesome dainties one can have for summer. So it is as well to learn how to make other sweet dishes. If they do not take the place of the pie in the affections of the family they will at least have the advantage of making them appreciate the pie all the more when they get back to it. And it is quite possible that the other desserts will win a place of their own in the fancies of those who learn to know them.

With the coming of berries a way is made plain for the housekeeper. They are good in so many different dishes that one is almost at a loss what to choose. The beauty of giving a recipe for one kind is that it will very often serve for cooking another sort. For instance, recipe for one kind is that it will very often serve for cooking another sort. For instance, suppose that one has a recipe that calls for raspberries, red or black. It makes no difference, in the first place, if these are the berries that ripen in the garden or if they are those that the children gather in the fence corners where they grow wild. Then, too, if the raspberries go, blackberries, low bush or high bush, can be used in the place of the raspberries and will be just as good. The blueberries, too, can be put in dishes that call for blackberries and when you have recipes that demand blueberries, the shiny black huckleberries can serve in their place.

so, too, with the currents and cherries. They can be used in much the same way and either one is so good that it is hard to choose a favorite retween them.

It is worth while now and then to put one's self

It is worth while now and then to put one's self out a bit to make a new dish for the sake of the pleasure the surprise will bring to the members of the family who had looked only for the same dishes they had been eating along steadily. Such a change brings an appetite even to a tired worker and is much more in value than the time and trouble it has cost. Change of fare may not do so much good as change of air, but it does not fall far behind it in its effect upon the appetite and so upon the health. upon the appetite and so upon the health.

BERRY MERINGUE PUDDING.

Rub a tablespoonful of butter into one cup of sugar until they are a cream and stir into them the beaten yolks of three eggs. While you are doing this have a cup and a half of fine white bread crumbs soaking in three cups of rich sweet milk. Stir these with the butter, sugar and egg yolks and put into a buttered pudding dish. Cover it, set it in the oven and bake until it is firm. Then draw it to the door of the oven and on top of the pudding strew two cupfuls of fresh berries. Strawberries make a delicious pudding, but raspberries are about as good. Whatever the berries, sprinkle them with sugar, using a little more of this make a delicious pudding, but raspperries are about as good. Whatever the berries, sprinkle them with sugar, using a little more of this with strawberries than with the sweeter raspberries. Have ready a meringue made by beating the whites of the three eggs stiff with a half cupful of powdered sugar. On the top of this stick half a dozen big strawberries, or strew a handful of raspberries. Put the dish back in the oven, brown the meringue lightly and set the pudding aside to become ice cold. Eat it with sugar and cream and return thanks for a delicious dessert. This has sometimes been called the Queen of All Puddings and it deserves the name.

CHERRY OR CURRANT OR BERRY DUMPLINGS. Sift a saltspoonful of salt and two teaspoonfuls of baking powder with three cupfuls of flour. Work into it a tablespoonful each of lard and of butter. Make it to a soft dough with sweet milk. The dough should be as soft as it will handle easily. Roll it into a sheet about half an inch thick and cut it into squares about three inches across. In the centre of about half an inch thick and cut it into squares about three inches across. In the centre of each of these heap as many cherries or currants or berries as the square will hold, strew sugar thickly over them and bring the corners of the paste together in the middle, pinching the edges so that they will not let the fruit escape. Lay with the pinched edges downwards in a floured pan and bake half an hour. Serve with hard sauce.

HOT BERRY SHORTCAKE.

Rub two tablespoonfuls of lard into four cups of flour and add to it one beaten egg. Into two cups of sour milk stir a teaspoonful of salt and an even teaspoonful of baking powder dissolved in hot water. Pour this upon the flour you have mixed with the shortening and egg and make into a dough. Do not mix it too stiff. Roll it out and make into a dough. Do not mix it too stiff. Roll it out into two sheets, the size to fit a baking tin, making one quarter of an inch, the other half an inch thick. Lay the thinner in the bottom of the tin, first greasing this and strew over it thickly berries of any sort. Raspberries, red or black, or blackberries or blueberries may be used or currants or cherries. The latter will need more sugar than the berries. Sliced apples, even, may be used, or sliced peaches. Over the berries lay the thicker sheet of dough and bake it in a good oven. When it is a fine brown, cut the shortcake into squares and pile them on a hot dish. When it is to be eaten, split it open, butter the inside and sprinkle with sugar. Eat hot. It is a very good dish for dessert or for breakfast or supper. Although it is too early as yet for blueberries I cannot refrain from giving the following recipe against the day when blueberries and huckleberries will be plenty. Either may be used in this recipe.

BAKED BERRY PUDDING.

Beat three eggs light, the whites and yolks separately, and add to the yolks a cupful of milk and three tablespoonfuls of melted butter. Sift a cup and a half of flour with a teaspoonful of salt and two teaspoonfuls of baking powder; stir in this, add the beaten whites, and when well mixed turn all into a broad pudding dish. Dredge a quart of berries with flour and empty them upon the batter, sprinkle them with four tablespoonfuls of sugar, and then stir berries and sugar lightly into the batter. Cover and bake for half an hour in a steady oven, uncover and brown. Serve from the dish in which it was baked and have either hard or liquid sauce with it.

Blackberries are perhaps best for this pudding although black raspberries are very good for it, too.

CREAM RASPBERRY TART.

CREAM RASPBERRY TART.

Iu spite of what I have said against pies I cannot refrain from giving the recipe for one that is good enough to be better known. For this a pie dish must be lined with a good paste and filled with raspberries, well sweetened. Over the top of these should be laid an upper crust, lightly,—not pressed down at the sides,—and this should be baked. When done the top crust should be lifted and a cream poured under it that has been made by stirring into half a cup of boiling milk half a tablespoonful of cornstarch rubbed smooth in cold milk, a tablespoonful of sugar and the beaten white of an egg. These should have been boiled together for five minutes and cooled before they are put in the tart. Replace the top, sprinkle with sugar and eat when cold.

ANSWERS TO QUERIES.

L. G. F. HOMER. Is there any way of pre-paring stewed rhubarb except cooking it plain. I do not want it in a pie. Stewed rhubarb is good cooked with raisins or with dates. For the latter have three quarters of a cupful of dates to a quart of the rhubarb. Soak the dates overnight, stone them and cut each date into three pieces. Put them over the fire with the uncooked rhubarb and stew together. The raisins do not have to be soaked. If they are the ordinary raisins they may be stoned, if they are the Sultana raisins they should be well washed. Allow a cupful of raisins to each quart of rhubarb and stew together. or with dates. For the latter have three quartogether.

J. M. J. OLYMPIA. Is there any way to get rid of big black cockroaches that infest a kitchen?

Make a mixture of two parts of cornmeal, one part red lead and one part sugar. Mix it to a paste with a little water and lay this in the track of the roaches. They will eat it greedily and it will poison them. The rind of green cucumbers is also recommended for roaches. Slice it and lay it about the kitchen overnight. The bugs eat it and it is fatal to them.

Young Housekeeper, York. What is meant when I am told to let my bread rise until light. How am I to know when it is light? The ordinary loaf bread should increase to twice its original bulk. When it reaches this point it is ready to go into the oven. Do not let it rise too fast.

CONSTANT READER. With the beginning of warm weather I am much troubled with red ants. They run all over my shelves and I cannot get get rid of them.

Try laying strips of fly paper on the edge of the shelves where you keep food. Do not leave any food uncovered and surround the articles containing it with fly paper. If they run about the tables leave a piece of fly paper out at night. This is said to clear them out in a short time.

EMMA J. G. Is there anything that can take the place of cream in cookery? It is not easy the place of cream in cookery? It is not easy for me to get it and so many dishes call for cream.

Nothing takes the place of cream in some dishes. But in others there are substitutes. For instance, if you are making a custard or ice cream, you can often make an extra egg give the rich effect that cream would produce. And in sauces and soups and such dishes if you must use milk instead of cream, add to the milk butter, in the proportion of a tablespoonful of this to a half pint of milk. If you will do this the taste will be about the same as if you had used cream. you had used cream.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT

O THE READERS OF COMFORT. It is the intention of the department useful as well as interesting. Questions a bout flowers and their culture will be cheerfully answered. If you don't see what you want, don't hesitate to ask for it. Someone else may want to know the same thing. Unless the attention of the editor is called to it, he might never sk questions. editor to make this of the editor is called to it, he might never think of it, therefore,—ask questions.

There will be much work to do in June, in order to make sure of fine flowers and plenty of them, later in the season. There will be weeds to pull, seedlings to transplant to places where seed failed to germinate, plants to set out from the window-garden, and insects to fight among the roses. All these things will keep the owner of even a small garden pretty busy.

Weed pulling is not pleasant work, but it has to be done, if you want good flowers. Thorough work at the beginning makes the work to be done afterwards much easier. Get the beds perfectly clean and keep them so. The sooner this is done the better, because weeds are sure to greatly injure your flower-plants if allowed to grow among them while they are small. There is a weeding-hook on the market which can be bought for ten cents. It is a sort of fine-fingered claw. With it you can tear weeds out of the ground at a rapid rate, giving it, at the same time, a scraping which is of great benefit to the plants growing in it. One can accomplish more with one of these weeding-hooks in half an hour than he can in half a day by the old method of hand-pulling. You can not invest ten cents to better advantage.

If you are going to buy a new hoe, let me advise you to get one with a V-shaped blade. The pointed end allows you to work close to a plant without running the risk of cutting it off, as you are quite likely to do if you use a hoe having a broad blade. picked out of the soil by it as deftiy as you could remove them with a trowel, and the plant growing alongside will not be disturbed in the least. The opposite end—in these hoes the socket for the handle is in the center,—has a broad blade, like the ordinary hoe, except that it is toothed, like a saw. This makes it extremely easy in a soil where it has free play.

Plants which are intended for use in the best of satisfaction. The solud be kept from flowering by the removal of every bud as soon as it is discovered. The branches should have their tips pinched off from time to time, to force the development of other branches, thus making the plant bushy and compact. If they entirely fill their old posts with roots, report them at once, in fresh soil. But do not give any fertilizer, as they will not need it while the soil is fresh, provided it is of ordinary richness. Keep them in an airy place on the veranda, where they will be sheltered from strong vinds and too hot sunshine. And be very sure to give them all the water they need. Evaporation will take place rapidly during how the veranda, where they will be sheltered from strong vinds and too hot sunshine. And be very sure to give them all the water them every day, sometimes twice, if the pots are small. plant.

If we would have good roses, we must fight for them. Worms, aphides, and the rosechafer, will soon spoil them if left unmolested. The wise woman will act on the defensive by beginning warfare before the pests come, for it is easier to keep them away than it is to get rid of them after they have taken possession of the bushes. The first insecticide I have any knowledge of is made by melting a quarter of a pound of the ordinary soap of household use in a pailful of water and spraying the entire bush with it. Be sure that it gets to the underside of the leaves. Make this application twice a week, and be thorough with it.

Window-boxes, as usually cared for, are failures, and the owners of them fail to see wherein they are to blame for lack of success which attends their efforts. After one or two seasons of discouragement they give up trying, thinking that they haven't the "knack," or, that window-boxes are "snares and delusions," as a general thing, and they are encouraged in thinking this by the forlorn look which characterizes the boxes of most of their neighbors. The few satisfactory ones they come across, here a nd there, strengthens them in the belief that to have a really fine box of plants you must be the possessor of a "knack," whatever that may be. No w the reason why window boxes are failures, nine times out of fifteen, is simply this: A pint of water is used where it ought to be a pailful. If you keep the soil moist all through, you can grow just as good plants in these boxes as you can in pots. Therefore apply at least a pailful to abox, daily. There will be no danger of overwatering. Try this plan, and see if you are not successful in making the plants in your boxes grow in a way to convince you that at last you have found out the "knack" of it.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

"Last summer my Asters were infested with aphis. They attacked the roots. What shall I do if they come this year? Mrs. W. W. M." Draw the earth away from the upper part of the roots and dust them well with tobaccopowder. Apply it liberally. It will not injure the plants and it will injure the aphis, if you use enough of it. Then put the earth back about the plant, and scatter the powder generously over it. Do this as soon as you find the first aphis.

about the plant, and scatter the powder generously over it. Do this as soon as you find the first aphis.

"Last year our lawn was disfigured by weeds. Is there any way of getting rid of them without injuring the grass. A. H. W." The only way to get rid of the weeds is to pull them, or cut them off below the crown, in case they are dandelions, or weeds of similar habit. It is hard work and slow work, but a pretty front yard is such an attractive feature of any home that it is worth expending a good deal of work on. All plants having a crown can be destroyed by running a sharp bladed knife across them two or three inches below the surface of the soil in such a manner as to sever crown and root. After cutting the crown off remove it or it may send out roots. Chickweed, and all other weeds of that class, must be pulled up very carefully that no pieces be left to take the place of the old plant.

I want some Hollyhocks for next season's flowering. When shall I sow the seed? Mrs. M. M. L." In July. All perennial plants should be started then if you grow them from seed.

"I would like to know how some persons keep their Sweet Peas blooming until late in the fall. Mine won't. Must I get a particular kind of seed? B. K." What you want to do is to go over your plants every day, after they begin to blossom, and cut away every flower that has begun to fade. Keep seed from forming, and the plants in their efforts to perpetuate their species, will keep on producing flowers. What you do is to interfere with the processes of nature. What the plant does is to attempt to get the start of you. In this way, flowers are secured long after one would expect any of the plants were left to follow out their own instincts and impulses. This applies to other annuals as forcibly as it does to Sweet Peas.

Medical Advice Department for Women.

Realizing the vast amount of sickness and suffering endured by women, many of whom are subscribers of "Comfort," and how thousands are dragging out a painful existence, dreading to consult their family physicians regarding their private ills, and how others are paying out their hard-earned money for treatment without favorable results, we have pleasure in making the following announcement: -

We have made a special arrangement with one of the greatest living specialists in female diseases, which will enable any woman to obtain the fullest and most expert advice about her illness and how to cure it, absolutely without cost or obligation.

This specialist is accredited with having performed more cures of woman's peculiar ills than any other person, and through whose advice thousands of women have been restored to health and strength.

Please bear in mind that this is no "fake" advertisement, and the announcement is made simply for the purpose of putting our women readers who are sick and ailing in touch with this great specialist, at absolutely no cost whatever to them. This offer is made in good faith and will be honorably kept.

All you have to do is to write the symptoms of your ailment out fully and carefully and send it to the address below, and your letter will be put into the hands of this great specialist without being opened or read by any one else, and you will receive in return absolutely free the fullest expert medical advice from the best authority in this country on women's diseases. Address your letter to Mrs. Pinkham, Lynn, Mass., telling her you were prompted to write her by "Comfort," then you will be sure of special and prompt attention.

"You've been blind for many years?"

"It seems, sah, most terribly long," he said pathetically.

"You have no relatives?"

"No, sah."

"What pleasure is in life then?"

"It's a pleasure, sah, to wake up in the morning to think of the world, to hear people's voices. To live is to hear human voices. I want to live. I'd like to live foreer," Raby ended, his voice dying away in a mumble through his toothless gums.

"You've never had a large amount of money in your life, have you?"

"No, sah; no indeed." His wrinkles tried to form into a grin. "I always allowed it wasn't no use worrying. I took life as it come and didn't look for trouble. That's the best way to live long—and I reckon I've proved it, sah."

"Isn't it better to live and work and die than to live and work and then live on uselessly?"

"Maybe, sah, maybe," drawing the shawl about his shoulders closer as he feebly shook his head, "but I'd like, sah, to live out this century."

The Juvenile Essays.

There will be no award of prizes on the essays on "Theodore Roosevelt," the subject announced for May, owing to the fact that the conditions were not observed except in the fewest number of instances, and because, while nearly every state was heard from, there were not enough from each state to constitute a competition. "Comfort" is only too glad to give prizes to competing essayists among its subscribers, but it cannot award prizes unless there is competition, because it is not buying essays but endeavoring to encourage its young readers to improve themselves ty putting their thoughts into good shape on paper. The essays in themselves have no value, except in comparison with others. Write the essays and "Comfort" will have the prizes ready.

The result of the competition on the subject "Kindness to Animals," will be announced next month. During vacation there will be no contest.

CHAPTER XVIII.

IN A TRAP.

"Hold on, there! Open that door!" exclaimed Dodger, when he found himself imprisoned in the back chamber.

There was no answer.

There was no answer.

"I say, let me out!" continued our hero, beginning to kick at the panels.

This time there was an answer.

"Stop that kicking, boy! I will come back in fifteen minutes and explain all."

"Well," thought Dodger, "this is about the strangest thing that ever happened to me. However, I can wait fifteen minutes."

He sat down on a cane chair—there were two in the room—and looked about him. He was in an ordinary bedroom, furnished in the usual manner. There was nothing at all singular in its appearance.

On a book-shelf were a few books and some old numbers of magazines. There was one window looking into a back yard, but as the room was small it was sufficient to light the apartment.

Dodger looked about in a cursory manner, not feeling any particular interest in his surroundings, for he had but fifteen minutes to wait, but he thought it rather queer that it wait, but he thought it rather queer that it should be thought necessary to lock him in. He waited impatiently for the time to pass. Seventeen minutes had passed when he heard the bolt drawn. Fixing his eyes eagerly on the door he saw it open, and two persons entered. One was the hump-backed negro, carrying on a waiter a plate of buttered bread, and a cup of tea; the other person was—not the old man, but, to Dodger's great amazement, a person well remembered, though he had only seen him once—Curtis Waring.

"Set down the waiter on the table, Julius," said Waring.

Said Waring.

Dodger looked on in stupefaction. He was getting more and more bewildered.

"Now you can go!" said Curtis, in a tone of authority.

The negro bowed and after he had disposed of the waiter, withdrew.
"Do you know me, boy?" asked Curtis, turning now and addressing Dodger.
"Yes; you are Mr. Waring."
"You remember where you last saw me?"
"Yes, sir. At your uncle's house on Madison Avenue."
"Onite right."

"Quite right."
"How did you come here? Where is the old man whose value I brought from the Albany boat?"

Curtis smiled, and drew from his pocket a

Curtis smiled, and drew from his pocket a gray wig and whiskers.

"You understand now, don't you?"

"Yes, sir; I understand that I have been got here by a trick."

"Yes," answered Curtis, coolly. "I have deemed it wise to use a little stratagem. But you must be hungry. Sit down and eat your supper while I am talking to you."

Dodger was hungry, for it was past his usual supper time, and he saw no reason why he should not accept the invitation. Accordingly he drew his chair up to the table and began to eat. Curtis seated himself on the other chair.

"I have a few questions to ask you, and that is why I arranged this interview. We are quite by ourselves," he added, significantly.

"Very well, sir; go ahead."

"Where is my cousin Florence? I am right, I take it, in assuming that you know where she is."

"Yes sir: I know." answered Dodger, slowly.

"Yes, sir; I know," answered Dodger, slowly.
"Very well, tell me."
"I don't think she wants you to know."

Curtis frowned.
"It is necessary I should know!" he said, emphatically.

"I will ask her if I may tell you."
"I can't wait for that. You must tell me at

"I can't do that."

"I can't do that."
"You are mistaken; you can do it."
"Then I won't!" said Dodger, looking his companion full in the face.
Curtis Waring darted a wicked look at him, and seemed ready to attack the boy who was audacious enough to thwart him, but he restrained himself and said:

"Let that pass for the present. I have anther question to ask. Where is the document other question to ask. Where is the document you took from my uncle's desk on the night of the burglary?"

And he emphasized the last word.
Dodger looked surprised.
"I took no paper," he said.
"Do you deny that you opened the desk?"

"Do you deny that you opened the desk?"

"You can hardly make me believe that. Why did you open the desk if you did not propose to take anything?"
"I did intend to take something. I was under orders to do so, for I wouldn't have done it of my own free will; but the moment I got the desk open I heard a cry, and looking round, I saw Miss Florence looking at me."

"And then?"

"I was startled, and ran to her side."

'No, I didn't. She talked to me so that I felt ashamed of it. I never stole before, and I wouldn't have tried to do it then, if—if someone hadn't told me to."

"I know whom you mean—Tim Bolton."
"Yes; Tim Bolton, since you know."
"What did he tell you to take?"

"The will and the money."

"Exactly. Now we are coming to it. You took them, and gave them to him?"

"No, I didn't. I haven't seen him since that night."

Curtis Waring regarded the boy thoughtfully. His story was straightforward, and it agreed with the story told by Tim himself. But, on the other hand, he denied taking the missing articles, and yet they had disappeared. Curtis decided that both he and Tim had lied, and that this story had been concocted belied, and that this story had been concocted be-

Probably Bolton had the will and the money

Probably Bolton had the will and the money (the latter he did not care for), and this thought made him uneasy, for he knew that Tim Bolton was an unscrupulous man, and quite capable of injuring him, if he saw the way clear to do so. "My young friend," he said, "your story is not even plausible. The articles are missing, and there was no one but yourself and Florence who were in a position to take them. Do you wish me to think that my cousin Florence robbed the desk?"

"No, sir; I don't. Florence wouldn't do such a thing," said Dodger, warmly.
"Florence. Is that the way you speak of a young lady?"

He had to wait for fifteen minutes. Then he the had to wait for fitteen minutes. Then he saw approaching a young man, not far from twenty-one, who looked like a young mechanic, returning from his daily work.

Now was Dodger's opportunity. He put his head out of the window and called out:

"All that is very affecting; however, it isn't to the point. Do you know," he continued, in a sterner tone, "that I could have you arrested for entering and breaking open my uncle's desk with burglarious intent?"

"I suppose you could," said Dodger; "but Florence would testify that I took nothing."

"No, sir; I don't refuse. I would tell you if Curtis regarded the boy in some perplexity.

He had every appearance of telling the truth.
Dodger had one of those houest, truthful countenances which lend confirmation to any words spoken. If the boy told the truth, words spoken. If the boy told the truth, what could have become of the will—and the money? As to the former, it might be possible that his uncle had destroyed it, but the disappearance of the money presented an independent difficulty.

and aimed it at the boy.

"Understand me, boy," he said, "I am in earnest, and I am not to be trifled with."

Dodger drew back, and Curtis opened the door and went out, bolting it after him.

AN ATTEMPT TO ESCAPE.

While Dodger had no discomfort to complain of, it occurred to him that Florence would be alarmed by his long absence, for now it seemed

He was as good as his word. He went to the outer door and rang the bell.

Julius came to the door.
"What's wanted, boss?" he said.

"What's wanted, boss?" he said.
"You've got a boy locked up in a room."
"Who told you, boss?"
"He threw down a paper to me, telling me he was kept a prisoner."
"What did he say?" asked Julius.
The young man read the note aloud.
"What have you to say to that, you black imp?" he demanded, sternly.
The ready wit of Julius served him in this emergency.

emergency.
"Dat boy is crazy as a loon, boss!" he answered, readily. "We have to keep him shut up for fear he'll kill some of us."

"You don't say!" ejaculated the young medanic. "He don't look like it."

"No, he don't look like it."
"No, he don't; dat's a fact, boss. Fact is, dat boy is de artfullest lunytick you ever seed. He tried to kill his mother last week." "Is that true?"

"1s that true?"
"Dat's so, boss. And all de while he looks as innocent as a baby. If I was to let him out he'd kill somebody, sure."
"I never would have believed it," said the

"I never would have believed it," said the young man.
"If you want to take the risk, boss, you might go up and see him. I b'lieve he's got a carvin'-knife about him, but I don't dare to go up and get it away. It would be as much as this nigger's life is worth."
"No," answered the young man, hastily, "I don't want to see him. I never did like crazy folks. I'm sorry I gave you the trouble to come to the door."
"Oh, no trouble, boss."

come to the door."

"Oh, no trouble, boss."

"I guess I've fixed dat boy!" chuckled Julius.
"Ho, ho! he can't get ahead of old Julius!
Crazy as a loon, ho, ho?"

Dodger waited anxiously for the young man to get through his interview. He hoped that he would force his way up to the third floor, draw the bolt and release him from his imprisonment.

He kept watch at the window, and when the young man reappeared, he looked at him eagerly.

"Did you ask them to let me out?" he shouted.

The other looked up at him with an odd expression of suspicion and repulsion.

"You're better off where you are," he said.
"But they have locked me up here."

'And reason enough, too!

"And reason enough, wor.
"What makes you say that?"
"Because you're crazy as a loon."
"Did the black man say that?" inquired Dodger, indignantly.

"Yes, he did—said you tried to kill your mother, and had a carving-knife hidden in the room."

"It's a lie—an outrageous lie!" exclaimed Dodger, his eyes flashing.
"Don't go into one of your tantrums," said the man, rather alarmed; "it won't do any good."

"But I want you to understand that I am no more crazy than you are!"

"Sho! I know better. Where's your carving-knife?"

"Sho! I know better. Where's your carving-knife?"
"I haven't got any; I never had any. That negro has been telling you lies. Just go to the door again and insist on seeing me."
"I wouldn't das't to. You'd stab me."
"Listen to me!" said Dodger, getting out of patience. "I'm not crazy. I'm a newsboy and baggage-smasher. An old man got me to bring his valise here, and then locked me up. Won't you go round to the station-house and send a policeman here?"
"I'll see about it," said the young man, who did not believe a word that Dodger had said to him.

"I want you to unbolt the door and let me out."
"I couldn't do it, nohow," said Julius. "I couldn't do it, nonow," said Juius,
"It would be as much as my place is worth."
"I will give you a dollar—five dollars—if you

"Look here!" said Dodger, bethinking himself of what had happened. "Did you tell that young man that called here just now that I was crazy?"

Julius burst into a loud guffaw.
"I expect I did," he laughed. "Said you'd got a long carvin'-knife hid in de room."
"What made you lie so?" demanded Dodge sternly.

"Couldn't get rid of him no other way. Oh, how scared he looked when I told him you tried to kill your mother."

And the negro burst into another hearty laugh which exasperated Dodger exceedingly.

"How long is Mr. Waring going to keep me here? Did he tell you?" Dodger asked, after a reasse.

pause.
"No; he didn't say." "When is he coming here again?"

"Said he'd come tomorrow night, most likely." "Will you bring me a light?"
"Couldn't do it. You'd set the house on fire."

It seemed useless to prolong the conversa-

Dodger threw himself on the bed at an early hour, but he did not undress, thinking there possibly might be a chance to escape during the night.

But the morning came and found him still a prisoner, but not in the solitary dwelling.

CHAPTER XX. A MIDNIGHT RIDE. Curtis Waring had entrapped Dodger for a double purpose.

It was not merely that he thought it possible the boy had the will, or knew where it was.

He had begun to think the boy's presence in New York as dangerous to his plans.

John Linden might at any time learn that the son, for whose disappearance he had grieved so bitterly, was still living in the person of this street boy. Then there would be an end of his hopes of inheriting the estate.

Only a few months more and the danger would be over, for he felt convinced that his uncle's tenure of life would be brief. The one essential thing, then, seemed to be to get Dodger out of the city.

The first step had already been taken; what the next was will soon appear.

Scarcely had Dodger failed in his attempt to obtain outside assistance when an unaccountable drowsiness overcame him, considerably to his supprise.

his surprise.

"I don't know what's come to me," he said to himself. "It can't be more than seven or eight o'clock, and yet I feel so sleepy I can hardly keep my eyes open. I haven't worked any harder than usual today, and I can't understand it."

Dodger had reason to be surprised for he

Dodger had reason to be surprised, for he didn't usually retire till eleven o'clock.

In a city like New York, where many of the streets are tolerably well filled even at midnight, people get in the way of sitting up much later than in the country, and Dodger was no exception to this rule.

Yet here he was ready to drop off to sleep before eight o'clock. To him it was a mystery, for he did not know that the cup of tea which he had drunk at supper had been drugged by direction of Curtis Waring, with an ulterior purpose, which will soon appear.

"I may as well lie down, as there is nothing else to do," thought Dodger. "There isn't much fun sitting in the dark. If I can sleep, so much the better."

Five minutes had scarcely passed after his head struck the pillow, when our hero was fast

At eleven o'clock a hack stopped in front of the house, and Curtis Waring descended from it.

"Stay here," said he to the driver. "There will be another passenger. If you are detained I will make it right when I come to pay you."

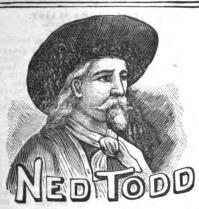

"All right, sir," said the hackman. "I don't care how long it is if I am paid for my time."

Curtis opened the door with a pass-key, and found Julius dozing in a chair in the hall.

"Wake up, you sleepy-head," he said. "Has anything happened since I left here?"

"Yes sir; de boy tried to get away."

"Yes sir; de boy tried to get away."
"Did he? I don't see how he could do that.
You kept the door bolted, didn't you?"

The opening chapters of this intensely interesting story appeared in February Comfort. Back numbers may be obtained by enclosing three cents to Comfort, Augusta, Maine., for each number desired.

During the past year portions of Indian Territory were opened to settlement by the Government allotment of lots by chance, and the scenes that were enacted in the years gone by, when Oklahoma was the objective point of settlers from east and west, north and south, were again presented in a much more exciting manner. A Kansas telephone girl luckly secured a lot valued at $17,000, and others were nearly as fortunate.

fortunate.

Because of the exciting events that have transpired in Oklahoma and Indian Territory, events that have attracted the attention of the whole country, the story of "Ned Todd" is presented to our readers in the hope that instruction and entertainment may be derived from its perusal.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE WONDERS OF OKLAHOMA.

O sudden was the attack that the horsemen were unable at first to make any move at defense. The affrighted horses reared and plunged and began backing, backing away! Back, back, back, they struggled, dragging the bandits after them.

"Whoa, hold on, stop!" cried the attacking party.

"Let go!" thundered Archie.
"Don't you try that on, or we'll open fire on "Arch Holland, brother, surrender!"

It was the same cold, sinister voice which had all day long rung in his ears. He heard it with a shudder, for well the youth knew the voice. The owner of it had brought more woe to his young heart than all the remainder of the world.

"Oh heaven help me," screamed the beautiful girl, who was about to be dragged from the horse.

Archie's blood was now up. Quick as a flash he snatched a heavy pistol, and felled the ruffian who had seized Daisy. The next moment he had knocked down the man who was ment he had knocked down the man who was holding his horse by the bit, and the animal bounded away like a flash.

Three or four stunning reports rang out on the air, and Archie's horse gave a spasmodic leap forward, with a more than human cry.

"He's hit," said the youth. But they were too closely pressed to see how bad the wound. The steed madly thundered away at a breakneck speed down a narrow ravine. Archie asked Daisy if she was hurt.

"No," she answered.

"Where is the detective?" the youth asked mechanically.

"Where is the detective?" the youth asked mechanically.

"I do not know," the terrified girl answered.

"I do not think he got away."

Though he listened intently, not a sign of Major Todd was to be seen or heard.

The horse was going slower and slower every moment, and Archie discovered that his side was covered with blood.

"He can't go much farther," he said.

"Then he was badly hit?" asked Daisy.

"Yes, he has got his death shot."

The poor beast carried, by his last aspiring effort, his double load far beyond the enemy. But it was evident that he could not go much farther."

"See he is sinking," said Archie.
"Poor creature, he has given his life for us," said Daisy.

The animal was trembling, and frequently stumbled, as he still galloped feebly over the rough uneven ground.

All of a sudden he came to a standstill, and began to tremble and stagger. Archie knew that it was time for them to dismount, and springing from the saddle assisted Daisy to the springing from the saddle assisted Daisy to the ground. The horse reeled for a moment, and then sank to earth, to rise no more.

"Poor fellow, he has done us a noble service," said the youth, sadly, as he stood by the side of the dying beast. They had no time to give in thought to the faithful brute. The enemy might even then be within ear shot of them, and Archie Holland once more drew the arm of the beautiful girl within his own and started the beautiful girl within his own, and started away through the forest.

Whither should they go? In what direction lay safety and security? These were pertinent questions for both Archie and his fair comanion. Questions for which he had no possible solution.

"We cannot stay long here," he at last said.

"Do you feel able to travel farther on foot?"

"Yes, I can go all night," she bravely answered, "but what are you going to do about Major Todd?"

"We can at present do nothing. Your safety must now be looked after, and I will have to trust to the Major's own prowess and courage to liberate himself from these desperadoes."

The woods were very dark. There was no moon, as there had been the night before, to Archie Holland was unable to tell in what direction to go. Without either moon or stars to guide him, and not having any compass, he was completely lost. His companion kept at his side, but he could frequently feel her trembling as she clung to him. As they were struggling through the wood they were suddenly startled by a wild, unearthly cry.

"But that monster, surely it was near."

"It is not so near as it may seem."
The distant rumbling thunder fell upon their The distant rumbling thunder fell upon their cars, followed by a vivid flash of lightning. Though Archie strained his eyes to catch a glimpse of the monster, whose howl he had heard, he was unable to do so. The lightning's flash gone, all was once more an almost impenetrable darkness. The blackness was even more intense than before.

Just as our two wanderers took another step forward, they were again startled by another unearthly shriek from that selfsame monster. "Heaven preserve us," groaned the girl. "Courage!" he whispered.

The last cry was still nearer to them, and so loud and deafening that they almost imagined that they could feel the earth tremble beneath their feet.

their feet.

Archie thought that he could see a pair of fiery eyes before him, but was not altogether certain, until there came a flash of lightning, which illuminated the forest far and wide. Through the trees not more than fifty yards away, he saw an object of which he could only at that time catch a glimpse. But that glimpse was sufficient to almost curdle his blood. It was a long yellowish looking monster to him was a long, yellowish looking monster, to him it seemed to be ten or fifteen feet in length. He could make out a pair of fiery eyes, and a great could make out a pair of fiery eyes, and a great shaggy head.

Though he had never yet seen anything like it, yet he knew from what he had read of it, that it must be one of those monster cougars, that had wandered from the South up into this part of the world. Cautioning the girl not to lose her courage, he cocked his gun, and leveled it in the direction whence he had seen the monster. Even after the flash of lightning had disappeared he thought he could see two fiery orbs.

"Oh heavens, what is that?" the affrighted irl shrieked.
"Do not be scared," said Archie, cocking his and beating of the earth and bushes could still be heard.

"Oh, is it killed, is the terrible thing killed?" asked the poor frightened girl.

"It has got its death shot. Come on, let us get farther away. It might, in its struggles, spring upon us."

As they went away, the struggles of the monster became more and more feeble.

Soon the struggles ceased and the cougar became silent in death. Hand in hand the two fugitives wandered on through the woods and darkness, hardly knowing which way they were going, whether from or in the direction of the outlaws' strange cabin in the wilderness, from which they had fled.

On and on they wandered, until the storm burst upon them, and then crouching beneath a great oak they waited for it to subside. The wind blew a perfect hurricane, and both were soon drenched to the skin from the rain. Great trees were uprooted and shattered to splinters almost at their feet, and yet they remained unharmed. At last the storm began to abate, and by the time it had disappeared and the sky was once more clear, day had begun to dawn.

"We will wait here until daylight," said Archie. "When the sun is up, and has dried our garments, we will feel more like travel. I must then try to get some food for you."

"And yourself, too," Daisy answered.

"Well, for both of us then, but as for me, I amable to take care of myself. I can really go longer without food than you."

Day dawned and the sun rose bright and clear. The two fugitives wandered through the

They halted directly before them, and he could distinctly hear a sullen growl, as if some monster was crouching for a spring. Archie Holland felt his blood run cold. A shot would be almost at random, he knew, but it was evidently disastrous to wait. He waited a moment for another friendly flash of lightning to come to his aid, and not having the advantage of it, could wait no longer, and fired.

Before sending the shot at the monster, he had taken the precaution to place Daisy Miller behind a tree, and the moment he fired he flung himself upon the ground.

There was a howl of rage and pain, and a large body leaped completely over him. He heard it swish througa the air, and strike against the very tree behind which Daisy was

A Evidently the monster had been vivid flash of lightning lit up the entire scene. just as the monster bounded over the crouching youth, and having already got his revolver in his hand, he sent a pistol bullet into his body.

Another shriek of rage and agony filled the air, and Archie Holland bounded to one side. and allowed the monster to make another use less leap in the darkness.

Finding itself at fault, the cougar came to a halt and gave utterance to a most terrific howl, such as was well calculated to make the blood such as was well calculated to make the blood of the listeners grow cold. But Archie had begun a battle to the death, and he again cocked his pistol, and waited for a flash of lightning to show him the monster. Crouching upon one knee with pistol cocked, and the girl half dead with terror at the other side of the tree, he waited. At last the friendly flash came and he saw the monster standing not four paces away, its broad side toward him, and gazing away into the darkness trying to make gazing away into the darkness trying to make out the direction of its enemy. He discovered that it was badly wounded. It was rubbing its great bloody head, while the blood was gushing in a torrent from a bullet hole in its abdomen.

Quick as thought, the youth leveled his revolver at the head, and then leaned forward until the muzzle of his nisted alteret toward.

A blinding flash, a terrible report, and then all was darkness. A roar, a gurgling cry, and then a terrible threshing and beating of the bushes. Archie got out of the way, and creep-stuck into the bark of a sapling, so as to tear off a great strip. When Archie realized how near he had come to having those claws tearing his own flesh, he could not but shudder.

They quitted the scene and went through the forest until they came to the bank of the river. There upon a high bluff which overlooked the stream and vast valley below, they had a view of the wonders of Oklahoma. What a scene of loveliness! Far as the eye could see down the valley it was a picture of wondrous beauty. rall grass growing and waving in the breeze and trees could be seen singly and in groups, among which the wild deer and antelope played without any rude alarms of civilization to frighten. No hunter's gun had ever shocked their payers and no human face had ever grand. their nerves, and no human face had ever gazed their nerves, and no human face had ever gazed upon them before.

"I wish we could cross," said Archie.

"Where would we be then?"

"In the valley of the Canadian, and we could there find plenty of game to keep us alive while we traveled to the Seminoles, and get a conveyance home."

"Who are you, and what are you doing here?" a voice that seemed to thrill both hearers counded upon their ears.

Archie turned and discovered sitting on a large stone, not ten paces on his left, Oklahoma Peg, that mysterious being whom we met earlier in our story.

"Are you not the woman whom we met yes-terday?" he asked.
"I am, but you have lost one of your num-

"Am, but you have tost one of your humber and gained one."
"We have. Ned Todd——"
"Oh, you need not put yourself to the trouble to tell me," interrupted Peg. "I know it all without being told. Todd is in the clutches of Captain Snell and this girl is one you have taken from him."

There was a peculiar fierceness in Oklahoma Peg's black eyes, as she glared at the beautiful girl. She seemed as if she would like very girl. She seemed as if she would like very much to scratch her eyes out. Her look was one of hatred and devilish mischief.

"Didn't I warn you to leave Oklahoma? Didn't I tell you that it was death for you to remain in Oklahoma?"

"We are going if we can. All we want is to cross this stream," the youth answered.

"Cross the stream, fool, why do you want to cross the stream?" cried Oklahoma Peg. "If death is sure on this side, it is more than certain on the other."

Having given this very unsatisfactory information, she turned about and was going away, when Archie stopped her and said:

"One moment, Peg, are you our friend, or our enemy?"

"One moment, Peg, are you our friend, or our enemy?"

"Your friend or your foe. There are no friends here. We are all enemies to each other. Beware that you do not curse the day that ever you entered Oklahoma. They are nearer to you than you imagine. They may strike you some time when you least expect. Fool, fool, why did you ever come here? Snell is now not half a mile away from here. Look out, look out!" and before he was aware of what she was about, she suddenly darted toward a thicket and disappeared. He sprang after her and toward her, but as he leaped into the thicket, he felt a stinging blow on his head, and staggered, almost falling.

There was a shout and an oath, and a man leaped past him to the screaming girl, who was not half a dozen paces away.

Archie Holland rapidly recovered himself, and leaping on the stranger struck him a blow with the butt of his pistol that staggered him, The road agent recoiled from the blow, and then the two men, with weapons drawn, for a moment stood glaring at each other. It was only the calm before the storm, the lull before the battle. In another moment the conflict of life or death would begin.

or death would begin.

CHAPTER XIV.

IN THE CAVERN OF DEATH.

IN THE CAVERN OF DEATH.

There was only a momentary lull, then with a yell of rage the stranger fired his pistol, and sprang at Archie with drawn knife. The bullet struck the muzzle of Holland's pistol, and glancing away grazed his shoulder in its flight. His own weapon was discharged, but the bullet went wild of the mark.

The two clinched for a moment, and then their steel blades clashed, while the fire flashed from them. A moment later Archie Holland struck his enemy with the butt of his pistol, and staggered him.

Leaping to one side, he placed the muzzle of his pistol to his heart and fired. The fellow sank with a groan to the earth, and the conflict was over, unless there should be others to contend with.

"Oh, heaven help us, are you hurt?" sobbed poor Daisy, running to the side of her rescuer.

"No," he answered, panting for breath.

"I was sure you were killed. He must have cut you with that knife of his?"

"Not a scratch," panted the victor, gazing on the body of his fallen foe.

"I would not have done it if I could have helped it," he said to himself.

"I am so glad that you are not hurt," wept Daisy. "Are we not free from them now?"

The youth shook his head.

"Then let us go away at once."

Archie Holland had no desire to stay at this spot any longer. He did not care to gaze upon his victim, and as soon as he could gain breath enough from his struggle, he said he was ready to go.

They wandered down a path which led to a pine forest and wandered on and on for miles.

enough from his struggle, he said he was ready to go.

They wandered down a path which led to a pine forest, and wandered on and on for miles. At last he came upon a small lake at which a fawn was drinking. It was a very pretty little creature, and it looked like a pity to shoot it, but they were exceedingly hungry, so he leveled his gun and shot it dead in its tracks. He proceeded to skin and dress the animal, while Daisy prepared a fire and cooked the meat.

Both were so hungry, that they believed that this was the best meal they had ever eaten.

Their breakfast over, they resumed their wanderings. Both had begun to suffer from sore, bruised and bleeding feet. But they were flying from a foe that was merciless, and neither made any complaint.

That afternoon as they were wandering down a rocky ravine, they suddenly came upon the mouth of a cavern.

It was large and there seemed to be a well

It was large, and there seemed to be a well worn path going into it.

worn path going into it.

Caverns are not uncommon in the great West, and they would not have thought there was anything strange about this one, had they not seen a wall made of stone built across it. It seemed as if it had once been almost if not entirely blocked up with stone. It was no ordinary masonry. The stone was cut and smoothed and fitted down so nicely, there was no doubt but that a skillful hand had placed those blocks there.

"Don't go near that awful place," said Daisy.
"Why?"

"Look at that dark hole in the earth. I am certain that it must be death to any one to enter it."

"There is something very remarkable about that cavern," said Archie, "and yet there can't be any supernatural powers about it. I think that some one has occupied it long ago, and that there are wonders in there to be discovered, if we only go into it."
"But oh! don't go."

She pleaded so earnestly with him that for a few moments he was inclined to respect her wishes, but after a few moments he began to argue with her, and urge her to consent to his exploring the cavern.

"What advantage can it be?" she asked.
"It may be a great advantage," he answered.

Practical Dressmaking.

To Make Old Clothes Look Like New.

So many questions are asked "Comfort" by thrifty housewives all over the country, how to make over last year's things, and the best way to utilize old things, remnants and scraps, that this column will be devoted entirely to this commendable, many-times-necessary economy, and every woman is cordially invited to ask "Comfort's" help in this important branch of her work for adults and children. Address, Economy Editor, "Comfort," Augusta, Maine.

Mrs. R. T. H., Portsmouth, O.— Your old-fashioned lace sack comes into play for the dainty lace bertha, to be worn with the new silk gown. Cut off the bertha from the bottom, then you have the short sack to be cut into an exquisite silk waist covering. This is economy indeed—giving lovely trimming for two garments, so entirely different in design. Your fine old lace, too much worn to be used of itself, can be appliqued in bolero form on bodice or on revers, collars or cuffs. It can also be used on a bit of velvet in the same way in trimming hats. It depends on your quantity—whether you make a crown or rim—either will produce a most refined and elegant effect. These days of elaborate lace decorations call out the old-time tatting shuttle and crochet needle, also.

Miss Fannie B., Nestorville, W. Va.—You can remodel last season's white silk waist by a delicate touch of color. The dainty finish in some color, green, blue, or black, in tiny bands of silk stiched in white or with French knots, or both. Pale blue waists rank next to white this season. Your white linen will look like a new waist and can be made quite dashy by embroidery in shades of green with a bit of black here and there. Embroider white cloth waist in black.

Mrs. H., Emporia, Va.—It will depend on the kind of material your dark spring dress is made of.

of the black.

Mrs. H., Emporia, Va.—It will depend on the kind of material your dark spring dress is made of, whether or not it can be made over with light trimming for summer. If it is a dark cloth coat suit, rip up, clean, turn and put together with new linings. Wear it with white, or light waist of any kind. If it be a plain dress, do likewise, but cut the waist by a later pattern and lighten with any trimming in harmony with the material and color.

Mrs. G. R., Lamar, Wis.—You can make a very pretty waist of the skirt of your last season's plain blue lawn. Rip, and carefully press; cut the waist dibson pattern or any you desire; trim with bands of white India linen, briar stitched or French knotted with blue silk, or embroider in tiny flowers.

Miss Hattie G., Milo, Iowa.—Your scraps of lace and ribbon and flowers will trim your new spring hat nicely. First immerse your black lace in a bowl of alcohol, spread out to dry, and that will be as good as new. With the black velvet ribbon and black lace your large white roses will look fresh. Arrange the flowers and black lace on front of the hat, and the velvet ribbon in loops and ends at the back, any arrangement that is becoming will be the most effective.

Mrs. Kate R. Bethany, Ill.—Pillow show descriptions.

back, any arrangement that is becoming will be the most effective.

Mrs. Kate R., Bethany, Ill.—Pillow sham dressing sack. First rip the wide lace from your old pillow shams; take out the inserting, whip these together; cut a deep yoke of the linen; tuck in clusters; cut a straight piece of the linen; tuck in clusters; cut a straight piece of the linen, allowing for a slight fullness, and put this on to the yoke. Then make a deep full ruffle of the lace and inserting, and sew that on and finish neck and sleeves with lace. Your dressing sack will then be complete, and at no expense of money.

Miss F. L., Pineville, N. C.—Your old lace curtains are certainly valuable. You can, by careful handling, arrange an attractive and pleasing trimming for almost any kind of summer dress or an exquisite lace bertha can be made. First soak the curtains several hours in soft warm water, with half pint of ammonia, well stirred before putting them in. When thoroughly cleaned, pin them down to dry. Cut out the daintiest leaves and flowers and lay the bertha pattern on the very thinnest parts. After cutting out, transfer the leaves and flowers in as artistic a manner as possible. Then for one dollar and forty-nine cents your windows may be drapped as artistically in muslin curtains as you will be in your pale blue.

muslin curtains as you will be in your summer dress.

Miss F. R. M., Bradford, Ills.—If your pale blue taffeta waist is not much worn it can be made quite pretty by trimming with bands of white silk stitched with blue, to form a yoke, or extend them to the belt. The most important fact in dressing is to have the garment suit the woman, whatever it may be. In selecting your wardrobe, first remember if this or that will harmonize with the figure or complexion of the wearer. You should never select stripes for your own use. They make a tall, slender person look taller. In using hair cloth, the hair in the cloth must run around the skirt (not up and down) and must always be shrunk before using. Many have the impression that hair cloth should be confined to skirts alone. It is used in coats, lackets and fur collars. The edges must be bound. (2) Certainly your ribbons can be made almost new, by washing in warm soft water and melted Ivory soap. Do not wring, but rinse well in warm water, stretch and pin down, rub with a dry cloth gently, until perfectly smooth. Never iron ribbon; and when dry roll them over a round box or a roll of paper. This is a bit of economy well worth of paper. This remembering.

of paper. This is a bit of economy well worth remembering.

Miss Maud R., Jackson, O.—All the dainty thin waists button up the back. Any becoming way you desire to trim your waist will be up to date, as there is every conceivable form of decoration. Any way you choose to arrange it, but something original, no doubt, would be more pleasing than many styles alike. You could make a tucked yoke and tucked elbow sleeves, or a straight yoke of fine embroidery with an embroidered ruffle below the yoke, and on the sleeves, finish the tucked yoke with ruffles of lace or of the goods with tiny inserting set in above the hem of the ruffle. That makes a dainty ruffle for most any kind of thin waist or dress. (2) A very pretty and simple way to remodel your satin waist is to trim with bands of the same, embroidered in tiny flowers; a white waist in Forget-me-nots; a lavender, in pansies, and so on. Make all the shadings of your flowers as near to nature as possible. You can scatter the flowers over the waist anywhere if you are unable to get material for the bands, making the waist entirely changed.

2251. HERMIONE SHIRT-WAIST.
Sizes, 32, 34, 36, 38, & 40 Bust Measure.

An elaborately designed shirt-waist, made over a fitted lining, has an exquisitely shaped yoke, tucks down the front and a fitted strap about the neck. The woman who desires to have considerable work on her shirt-waist cannot do better than to follow the Hermione design, and the pattern is eminently adapted to any of the light woolen fabrics and also in silk.

249. LEHIGH SHIRT-WAIST.
Sizes, 32, 34, 36, 38, & 40 Bust Measure.
The Lehigh Shirt-waist is the model waist of the season. It is quite plain and has three forward turning plaits at the neckband. There is no yoke or other trimming or complications about it. As a pattern it is most desirable because from it all waists may be modelled, and no end of tucking and decorations may be wrought upon it before placing the pattern on the cloth.

1138. JUAN SUIT. Sizes, 4, 6, and 8 years.

Sizes, 4, 6, and 8 years.

A standard and becoming design for a boy's sailor suit, and is suitable for all fabrics generally employed. The blouse generally matches the trousers, but ofttimes the blouses are made of washable fabrics and the shield and large collar are made detachable so that various changes may be made. Serge, tweeds and cheviots are the popular woolen materials, while linen, duck and Galatea cloth are much used for the warm season. Rows of narrow braid are used for trimming, and anchors or stars are embroidered on the shield piece and collar.

2118. MUSETTE FROCK.

2118. MUSETTE FROCK. Sizes, 8, 10, and 12 years.

A favorite style of the ever popular "sailor frock."
The frock is cut snug-fitting in the back, while the front has the blouse effect and revers. The skirt is gored. Woolens and heavy cottons are the materials most desired, with some contrasting color for the revers and chemisette.

2261—THISTLE FROCK. Sizes 12, 14 & 16 Years.

Sizes 12, 14 & 16 Years.

The Thistle frock, designed for a girl of twelve, fourteen or sixteen years, is dressy and exquisite in its style. The waist consists of a soft silk blouse, held to position over a fitted lining. Over the blouse there is a natty little bolero, trimmed with a decorated band around its edge, and also with two smart velvet bows. The sleeve reaches to the elbow, and is trimmed with a circular ruffle over a plaited one.

Sizes, 6, 8 and 10 Years.

The sailor suit really takes precedence over every style of girls' frocks for general wear. This design has a circular skirt, a waist that has a tight lining, and the loose sailor waist blouses over it. The shield-piece is faced on the lining, and the blouse is finished with a wide sailor collar. Light-weight woolens and heavy cotton fabrics are most desirable for this design.

sirable for this design.

2259. OSWALD BOLERO WAIST.

Sizes, 32, 34, 36, 38 & 40 Bust Measure.

The Bolero waist shown here is a combination of shirt-waist and bolero, and is very smart. The trimming is hand embroidery, although passementeric may be made to serve. The waist is silk, and is gathered to formulate a yoke at the shoulders and line of the bust, and the velvet girdle secures it to position. A combination of black and white would be very attractive.

2266. EUNICE FROCK. Sizes, 6 and 8 Years.

Sizes, 6 and 8 Years.

The frock is a simple little costume designed for six and eight year old girls. The waist is lined, and the skirt is a circular one, while the seam joining the two is concealed under a shaped belt. A figured percale, with corded pique forms a dainty combination. Wool and silk combinations will develop a pretty "best" frock. Blue and green suiting with vest of cream white, or red and black with rest stee of plain red silk would also be attractive. vest, etc., of plain red silk would also be attractive.

2334. Skirt, 1874.

2262—COLUMBIA FROCK.

Sizes, 6, 8 & 10 Years.

An especially pretty design for little girls. It has the wide turned-over sailor collar which so admirably trims the back of the frock. The skirt is circular fitted with a dart on the side and has an inverted box-plait at the middle of the back. Narrow braid and buttons provide the necessary decoration. Blue silk gingham, with white vest and braid, and pearl buttons, would make a dainty frock. Percale, pique, chambray and woolens generally are also in good taste.

2101. DAHLIA FROCK.
Sizes, 6, 8 and 10 Years.

Quite a novelty for a sailor suit is shown in this design. Instead of being gathered in front, the little blouse is laid in plaits, stitched a quarter of an inch from the edge. The back is plain and the sleeves are the full bishop style. The skirt is plaited and stitched to the blouse. If preferred, the plait may be left unstitched or gathered. It is suitable for woolen or cotton fabrics, trimmed with band or flat trimming.

band or flat trimming.

2258. SAVOY BLOUSE.
Sizes, 32, 34, 36, 38 & 40 Bust Measure.
2257. SPENCER SKIRT.
Sizes, Medium and Large.
The blouse jacket seems to be the one in popular favor this season, and this design, though simple, is very jaunty when well made, decorated with stitching and lined with silk. Developed in black broadcloth it will prove useful to wear with odd skirts. The skirt is an excellent design for silk, wool or wash fabrics. The seams and edges of the founces may be simply stitched or decorated with applique insertion, narrow velvet ribbon, or bias folds of silk according to the taste of the maker.

2334. BALFOUR SUIT.

applique insertion, narrow velvet ribbon, or bias folds of silk according to the taste of the maker.

2334. BALFOUR SUIT.

Sizes, 6, 8 and 10 Years.

This pretty suit for boys is made of wool goods or of pique or linen, and is exceedingly smart and up-to-date. This pattern is a treasure to the woman who has a tailor-made skirt of her own to make over into a boys' suit. While these little suits are quite expensive in the stores at this season, they may be made at home at a triffing cost. The trousers blouse slightly over the knee. If made up in cotton goods, the goods should be well shrunk before making up.

2317. THORNTON JACKET.

Sizes, 32, 34, 36, 38 and 40 Bust Measure.

2256. VESTA SKIRT.

Sizes, Medium and Large.

The Thornton jacket is very natty in its lines, and very graceful and dressy. While suited to any materials made into street gowns, it may be developed in corduroy or velvet, and have white silk collar and cuffs decorated with French knots, or the silk may contain its own polka dots. The jacket has the habit back now so popular, and the sleeve has the wide cuff turned back loosely like a gauntlet. The skirt is a handsome five-gored pattern. The seams are strapped and stitched, and the style is suitable for woolen goods. the style is suitable for woolen goods.

Waist, 2258. Skirt, 2257.

2330. DAISY WAIST. Sizes, 14 and 16 Years.

Nothing could be daintier for girls of the age mentioned than this waist. The yoke consists of tucks that are loosened for a full blouse. Embroidered daisies outline the yoke. Three yards of goods are required to make this waist. It would be an attractive design for a graduation gown.

2332. THEODORA WAIST. Sizes, 14 and 16 Years. 1874. ANNIS SKIRT. Sizes, Medium and Large.

This is a good suggestion for making a gingham, batiste or foulard frock for a young miss. The one in the design is blue and white china silk trimmed with novelty lace; the chemisette is white silk trimmed to the skirt is a simple four-gored design, with the fullness gathered in the back. It has two circular ruffles five inches deep set on the bottom of the skirt, which makes a convenient as well as attractive finish, as the skirt can be lengthened at any time, and the plecing hidden by the ruffle.

Flossie Field.

(CONTÍNUED FROM PAGE 8.)

"Oh, thanks," said Flossie, as he led the way into Mrs. Wurtemberg's somewhat tawdry parlor, "but I must go to my mother at once. She will want me." The minister hesitated a moment, then raised his hand to check her as she would have glided his hand to check her as she would have glided past.

"My child," said he, tenderly, "she will never want you any more. I would like to break the awful tidings more gently, but I don't know how. It is best, perhaps, to know the worst at once. Your mother is dead, Flossie. It is scarcely an hour since she passed away, very quietly, in her sleep, without even a pang."

Flossie looked wistfully at the kind old face. Was he talking to her? Or was it someone else? Surely those dreadful words could not be meant for her. She was excited, overdone-perhaps her mind was unbalanced!

In a second, however, she broke from his restraining hand, pushed past Mrs. Wurtemberg, who vainly strove to block the door, and rushed to her mother's room.

"Mother! Mother!" she cried, wildly. "Speak to me! Oh, merciful God, she is dead!" UNSHINE, dancing, gleaming sunshine everywhere! It glowed in the azure sky flecking the lazily drifting clouds till they glistened like snow; it glinted on the rippling water of the great rolling river till one thought only of the beauty of its playful surface and the terrors of the deepness and darkness below were blotted out. Even the plain little ferry office on its floating wharf shared some of its glory, and the old scarred, white painted thing was so softened and mellowed by the red evening glory that an artist might have seen fit to put it in a picture.

There was only one object who seemed somehow to have missed the brightness. It shone all about him, but not on him. He looked up as the heavy ferry boat jarred against the wharf and the blue eyes in his round German face searched the faces of the landing passengers in a pitiful, dazed sort of way. They were used to seeing him there. Every evening during the summer he had come down after his work in the car shops was over and had sat there, gazing into the water as if he imagined it were the ocean across which he might catch glimpses of the Fatherland. There were not many traces of sentiment in the round, rosy face, but there must have been some, somewhere in the square little frame, for only a sentimental person could have cared to bring his loved one's letters down to the river in order to read the same one over evening after evening until another came, and so on all during the summer months.

He was not a bit ashamed of his little romance either for one day a ferryman had laughingly seized the letter and looked for the signature and ever afterwards had teased him signature and ever afterwards had teased him about his little Gretchen, but he only succeeded in provoking a foolish, hasty little smile and a deepening of the rosy hue in his face. No one could really tease him about Gretchen. She was his hope, his sort of earthly heaven, and the thought of the time when he should have saved money enough to bring her to America and have her with him always was what sustained him and made his laborer's existence almost happy and content.

sustained him and made his laborer's existence almost happy and content.

His actions did not seem at all strange to himself. He could not have Gretchen with him on his evening strolls, so what more natural than that the precious white leaves of paper inscribed with the dear loving words of his own country, written by the hand he loved best on earth, should accompany him.

"Ich liebe dich, Ich liebe dich, mein Fritz," she so often ended, as though her whole letter had not breathed her love in every line. When Fritz came to these words a glad light would spring to his eyes, making his plain face beautiful and if he thought no one were looking, he would press the paper passionately to his lips.

Today, the light in his eyes had gone out and left them dull like some animal's eyes dazed with pain.

The collector of the ferry rallied the little Dutchman as usual as he passed him on his way up the levee. He was going home to supper and his children were waiting for him in a wagon at the top of the hill, but when his good-natured jokes failed to elicit any response he stopped and laid his hand wonderingly on Fritz's shoulder.

"What's the matter, old man? Has Gretchen gone back on you? You seem rather under the weather this evening."

The little Dutchman's face grew a trifle more stony and he never turned his gaze from the sunny water.

"She is dead," he answered, and his voice

"She is dead," he answered, and his voice sounded strange, even to his own ears.

The ferryman felt his voice grow husky as he pressed 'Fritz's hand, but his sympathy seemed to fall on deaf ears and he turned away, feeling that the German preferred to be alone.

The glorious sunlight slowly faded, climbing higher and higher, up the stone piers of the massive bridge which spanned the river several yards lower down stream. A passenger train went over it and one or two freights thundered across but Fritz did not notice them. His eyes were ever on the rapidly flowing water at his feet. He watched it change from ruddy gold to a pearly pinkish grey in the sunset light, then it grew dark and cold as the rosy flush died out. The Government was widening the channel some distance below and a force of night work men had been put on to hurry the work through before high water. Their lights glowed like fairy lamps on the dark water and the clink of their hammers on the rocks sounded through the sweet evening stillness.

THE LORD'S PRAYER ECHOED.

If any be distressed and fain would gather If any be distressed and fain would gather Some comfort, let him haste unto Our Father.
For we of hope and help are quite bereaven. Except Thou succor us, Who art in heaven. Thou showest mercy, therefore for the same, We praise thee singing:

Hallowed be Thy name.
Of all our miseries cast up the sum; Show us Thy joys and let Thy kingdom come.
We, mortal are, and alter from our birth; Thou, constant art;

We, mortal are, and alter from our birth;
Thou, constant art;
Thy will be done on earth.
Thou madest the earth, as well as planets seven,
Thy name be blessed here
As 'tis in heaven.
Nothing we have to use, or debts to pay,
Except Thou give it us.
Give us this day
Wherewith to cloth us, wherewith to be fed,
For without Thee we want
Our daily bread.
We want, but want no faults, for no day passes
But we do sin.

But we do sin.

Forgive us our trespasses.

No man from sinning ever free did live,
Forgive us Lord our sins,

As we forgive.

If we repent our faults, Thou ne'er disdain'st us;
We pardon

Them that trespass against us.

Them that trespass against us.

Them that trespass against us.

Forgive us that is past, a new path tread us;
Direct us always in Thy faith,

And lead us—
Us, Thine own people and thy chosen nation,
Into all truth, but

Not into temptation.

Thou that of all good graces art the Giver,
Suffer us not to wander,

But deliver
Us from the fierce assaults of world and devil
And flesh; so shalt Thou free Us from all evil.

star-lit sky. He had always believed that God was somewhere up beyond those revolving worlds, but he could not find him there, only people who had died could go there.

A light seemed to dance in his tortured brain.
Only people who had died; then why should he not die? A restful peace stole into his soul.
The river splashed gently just at his feet. It was deep and cool and he was tired and lonely. He began to realize how long the waiting had been now. Gretchen must want him, too, he thought, and he would not wait any longer but been now. Gretchen must want him, too, he thought, and he would not wait any longer but go to her tonight.

The lights of an approaching ferry shone like two great burning eyes as it steamed slowly under the bridge and then shutting off some of her steam, moving slowly in toward her landing. As she came nearer the water between her side and the wharf was ploughed up by the paddle wheels into lashing foam. The collector at the gate was just reaching out his hand to open it, as they were only a few feet from the wharf, when a short, thick-set form was seen to plunge headlong into the churning water.

They were several hours finding the body but at last it was discovered where it had drifted down near a pier of the bridge.

"It is the little Dutchman," some one said. "He must have been struck by the paddle wheel for he was a good swimmer."

They all thought it was an accident, all but the collector on the day boat. He knew that a tragedy had been enacted after he left the wharf that night and that Fritz had gone to find little Gretchen, but somehow those two names had become sacred to him and he never told the little Dutchman's secret. Only a merciful God knows all.

In making the bed, pin the lower sheet carefully into place on the under side of the mattress, that the patient, if uneasy, may not work it up into wrinkles. Fold the draw sheet and pin across the middle of the bed, allowing for it to extend from the patient's shoulders well below the hips. Put on the upper sheet, leaving it a little loose for the feet, and long enough to turn over the blanket at the top. Fritz heard all the sounds about him. He was conscious every half hour that the wharf was shaken by a landing boat, and that people passed him and that some even cast curious glances at him, but his soul was crushed under some terrible weight which he could neither battle against nor see his way through.

Once or twice he murmured, "Mein Gott, mein Gott," but it was more in a puzzled helpless way than as a cry of pain. Gretchen was with God, he reasoned; then he was alone.

"Allein, allein, immer allein!" The thought terrified him. He got up and went nearer the railing. His simple German mind was lost amid such vast thoughts as eternity and the infinity of God. Poor, blind human reasoning! He must find God—and Gretchen. Always Gretchen; she was the one sure thing in his whirling fancies. He raised his eyes to the destroyed with rust.

Taking it up he noticed that it was a gun that had never had a lock.

"It must have been a match lock," he said to himself. "Some of the early Spanish cavaliers who came here with the great De Soto lost their way, and perished in this cavern."

'Oh! that was long ago," cried Daisy. "Why, it is over two hundred years since De Soto with his steel clad warriors roamed over this part of the world."

"I suppose it is, yet here is the remains of

"I suppose it is, yet here is the remains of one of their guns." Arch pushed his way along, and throwing aside some loose stones, there was opened up aside some loose stones, there was opened up to view a larger cavity, extending farther into the earth. The way was now more difficult than it had been before. They found many curious things here to block their way. In some places were smooth blocks of stone, showing that they had been cut and chiseled by some hand long ages ago.

snowing that they had been cut and chisered by some hand long ages ago.

"We have certainly stumbled into a very mysterious country," Archie Holland remarked, as he paused and glanced ahead of him.

"Do you think that there has been any one here very lately?" asked the affrighted girl.

"I cannot say. Yet these dust covered stones seem to have been moved."

A little farther over loose blocks of stones.

A little farther, over loose blocks of stones, through narrow passages, and they came upon what seemed to be an underground precipice. They were standing on a bit of tableland, while below them was a vast yawning chasm. At their feet could be heard a roaring of falling water.

'Look there," said Daisy.
'Where? What do you see?" her companion asked. "A stairway leading down the steep. See, it "A stairway leading down the steep. See, it goes down there."

He looked, and sure enough, there was a stone stairway leading down the steep, into the apparently unfathomable darkness below.
It looked like a perilous descent, but Archie Holland was a daring youth, and this was an opportunity for exploration not to be neglected. He went on asking Daisy to follow after him, and to have a care as to how she stepped.

They were on the very edge of a ledge, and a single false step might hurl them into that dark unfathomable abyss below. At last the head of the stone steps was reached. How like stories in the wonderful Arabian Nights it all seemed.
They found the stone steps perfectly substan-They found the stone steps perfectly substantial, and they descended them.
"See, a stone bridge across that torrent," whispered Daisy.

How awe inspiring seemed that whisper.

perfectly awful, and Archie Holland found a peculiar sensation taking possession of his being. Sure enough, there was what might be termed a natural bridge, made, no doubt by the constant wearing of the water beneath.

On this they crossed over, and found themselves in a vast chamber, whose natural vaulted dome was fully a hundred feet above them. Archie halted a moment and taking one of the torches held it above his head, and examined as best he could the vast apartment. It was a monster chamber, and he yet saw no end to it. "Come on," he said, "we will cross the bridge."

Oh, let us not go any farther."

"Why, Daisy, are you afraid?"
"Yes, it seems so terrible."
"Its terribleness will disappear as we advance and explore the darkness."

They had gone but a few paces farther when a most ghastly sight met their view. There lying on the ground almost on the edge of the precipice, above the thundering torrent below, was a skeleton.

Daisy was first to discover it and gave utterance to a half smothered shriek. The flaring torch soon revealed other gristly bones that had been bleaching in this subterranean apartment. "Come away, oh heaven, come away," she groaned, clinging to Archie's arm. "This surely must be the cavern of death."

"There's nothing here that can harm you," said Archie. "Those dry bones are not dangerous, as if they had flesh upon them, and were alive. Let us explore farther."

But she would not. Still clinging to his arm she begged:

"Oh, come, for the love of heaven take me back to the light of day. Better die the victim of the Oklahoma outlaws, than to pass another hour in this horrible place."

"Very well, it is not my design to make you miserable if I can help it, and as this seems too much for you, much as it interests me, I will forego all pleasure of the exploration."

They turned about and started on their return from the cavern of death.

Daisy clutched his arm, and trembled so violently that she could scarce hold the torch in her hand.

entity that sale her hand.

"Let me carry the torch," he said.

"No, no, "she returned, "hold your gun and your pistol ready to defend us. I know that something most terrible is going to happen before we get out of this place."

"No, no, no, Daisy. There is nothing here to have possibly lain fear. These dead bodies have possibly lain here for a hundred years."

"No, no, they haven't. I know that this must be one of the secret rendezvous of the road agent, Captain Snell. I heard him say something about a great place like this. Oh, if we were out of here, and safe away from this forest, I would be happy."

"Have no fears, I promised your father when he was dying that I would save you, and I will."

"I know you will, if you can."

They had now reached the natural bridge, and were going over. The other side was reached, and they started up the narrow path along the ledge.

"Stop." It was Archie who spoke, and there was considerable alarm displayed in the tremor

"What is it?" she asked in a whisper.
"I hear a noise, don't you?"
"No. Which direction is it?"
"At the entrance."
"Yes, oh yes, I hear it now."

"Quiet, make no noise. Some one the cavern."

The heavy tramp of feet, and even the murmur of voices afar off, could be heard in that vast cavern. The youth knew that their torches must soon betray them, and he whispered:

"Extinguish your torch."

The hint had only to be given, until it was obeyed. In a moment the torches went out.

they looked like stars afar off, but anon they drew nearer, and when they were not but fifty paces away, winding about through the narrow and torturous ways and passages of the cavern, he could distinctly make out the forms of three men approaching them.

"We must hide, or they will see us. They are coming this way."
She knew it before he told her, but where were they to go?

Just before extinguishing his torch Archie had noticed a narrow path leading down under the approach to the natural bridge, which they

He whispered to the frightened and trembling girl, and told her to make no noise, but keep a firm hold on his arm and follow him. Then swinging his rifle about his shoulders he began the descent. It was quite steep, and in this plutonian darkness, almost impassable, at last he had reached what seemed to be a sort of a bench of rock just under the approach of the bridge. He groped about and found a place where there was a level spot, on which he placed the affrighted girl behind him. In groping around, he placed his hand upon a loose stone which was on the verge of the precipice, and he came very nearly knocking it over. He trembled at the thought of how near he had come to exposing their presence to their enemies, for had the stone fallen over the precipice, the splash must have inevitably betrayed them. "Wall, less make short work o' him, cut his throat an' throw him over inter the water, an' yer kin bet thet we'll never hear tell on him agin," said one of the voices that was coming down toward the bridge.

"No, less do a better way'n thet."
"What?" He whispered to the frightened and trembling

"What?"

"Ye see we're swore to git rid o' this ere Ned Todd fur good. Now thet we've got him in our clutches, less make ther most out o' him thet we kin. Less not kill him afore we throw him over, but bind him hand and foot, and gin him

A few moments later the trembling fugitives beneath the broad slab of stone heard the well-known voice of Nedd Todd say:

"Cowards, do you think I would utter a single screech, or make one appeal for mercy to such wretches as you? I will yet live to bring the last of you to the halter."

"Ber gosh, purty defiant, hain't he?"

"Bet he is, Dyke. Guess he's goin' ter die game."

The two men could be heard binding the prisoner, and after a moment's silence the determined Ned Todd said:
"Do your best, I can defy you. I will die like a man, and you shall not be gratified with a single groan from me."
"Ha, ha, Ned Todd, we can't make yer screech I reckin', but we'll know that yer can't do we'uns any harm."
"There will be others who will."
"Who'd ye think they ar', eh? That ar' youngster that was with yer an' got away from us? Wull ef yer a feedin' yerself on that ar' kinder chaff I tell yer it won't do. "You will reach the gallows yet," cried the brave detective.

"Not if I should die a thousand deaths. You are a set of merciless dogs. And I defy you, do with me as you will."
"Wall that's jist what we're goin' ter do. But thar's one thing we'd like ter know."
"I will give you no information if I know it."
"But ef ye'd tell us jist whar that ar' old cattle king, what we cotched a long time ergo, hez his money buried, why we'll let ye go."
"I know nothing of it. Nor would I tell you if I knew," Ned Todd defiantly answered. He knew full well that if he knew the secret, and if I knew," Ned Todd defiantly answered. He knew full well that if he knew the secret, and was to reveal it to them, that he would not be spared on account of it. It was certain death anyway.

"Is he all tied tight, Pike?"

"Yes."
"So't he couldn't git loose anyway?"

"Then over with him, and that ar' will be the end on 'im."

"Then over with him, and that ar' will be the end on 'im."

They seized the body of the bound detective, and lifting him in the air hurled him over into the dark abyss below. A moment after there was a heavy splash in the water.

"That's the end o' him," said one of his murderers, gazing down into the fathomless darkness. Subscribe to COMFORT at once and get the next installment of this fascinating story in the next issue. King Edward's yacht is most widely known for the series of unfortunate happenings which marked her early career two years ago. Launched at Pembroke in 1899, she was seemingly another triumph to the constructive genius of Sir William Temple, but this triumph was turned to something closely akin to disgrace when the yacht "turned turtle" in the dry docks while fitting. It was then found that she had been overloaded with ornaments and furnishings, and not only were her masts and stacks shortened, but much of her beauty had to be discarded before the Naval Board would pronounce her seaworthy. # WE GIVE THIS WATCH FOR A CLUB OF 4.

Thirty Minutes is a short time, but many have earned one of these watches in less time than that. It is one of the very best watches for time ever offered to our readers at no matter what the price asked for it. We know, of course, there are watches that cost more money, because they are in gold or silver cases, but they will not keep any better time, simply because they cannot. This watch keeps not perfect time, we never saw the watch that did, but it keeps as near perfect time as watches usually do. We have such faith in this watch as a timekeeper that we send with every one a guarantee just as binding as that given with any watch, no mater what make. We are willing to give you this watch if you will do us a slight service, which you can easily do in an hour. We wish to increase our subscription list, and we want the assistance of every reader of this paper to that end. We do not want you to do it for nothing, we will reward you for it. You can easily secure this valuable watch if you get four subscribers to this paper, at our special subscription price of 5 cents a year each. Do this, sending us $1.00, with the names of four subscribers to this paper, and we will send our paper to each subscriber for one year, and we will send you the watch to reward you for your efforts in our behalf. Start out now and see what you can do. Remember we guarantee every watch. If you get five subscribers and send us $1.25 for the same we will also send you and chain. Address

AN Young, the stage-driver from the Hard-scrabble route, sat down on the edge of the postoffice plat-form among the rest of the loafers who were enjoying the balmy air of early June.

"As I was sayin',"
the new arrival, "that old Seth Jephson was high water mark in meanness in our town. Most of his bus'ness was lendin' money. Used to rattle 'round town behind a furgy old white bose fuzzy old white hoss that was blind in one eye. Folks used to say that he kept the old hoss 'cause he couldn't see more'n ha't the fodder in his crib and used to leave a lot till the next time. Uncle Seth was deefern a haddock. But if anyone on the sidewalk so much as whispered "ten per cent" that old hoss would stop up so short ye'd think he had balked. Uncle Seth had him trained to do it."

'Old Jephson's alive now, hain't he?" asked

Ran Young.

"Yas, he lives over in that yaller house jest across the pick of Hardscrabble hill."
"Heard suthin' about him only this mornin'" said Young, slicing a sliver from a hitching post. "You all know Phinney's fool, don't ye? That great big slab-sided boy of his that hain't been right sence he had the scarlet fever? Lives neighbor to old Jephson, Phinney does. Wal, as I was walkin' my hosses up the rise of the hill today Phinney's fool come along the ro'd to'ards me, bellerin' like a May ca'f that's been reduced to tew tits. 'Ah, bah, hah-h-h!' he was goin'. Like to shied my hosses into the ditch when I come up to him. Had a reg'lar foghorn toot.

"'Ub-bub-bah,' he bawled, 'he go tooken my bait."

"Been fishin'?' says I.

"'Yah,' he says, lettin' out another howl.

"Fish take your bait?' I says.

"'Nah,' he howls.

"'What did?"

"He done it.' The fool jerked his thumb over his shoulder up the ro'd. Couldn't see nobody but old Jephson down on his knees seedin' in late turnips.

"I had the 'Nited States mails in under the seat but blame me I was interested in what the fool was howlin' about and I hung up and asked him some questions. Come to find out he had heard his father and some men talkin' about old Seth a few days before. One of the men had said, 'Ye can take a fish line and an old bunged cent for bait and catch Seth Jephson any day.'

"Wal, now do ye know that blamed fool of Phinney's got holt of an old-fashioned copper cent by robbin' his marm's pocket book or in some sech way and he hitched it onto a line and commenced promenadin' up and down the ro'd in front of Jephson's stun' wall. Jephson was over in the garden plantin'. Fool had the cent draggin' bout twenty feet behind. He reckoned he was enj'ying some good fishin.' He kept singin' 'Fishy, come bite, fishy come bite.'

"Wal, for a long time but the thing kept on so long that he fin'ly h'isted his specs up onto his for'rard and come to the wall to see what was doin'.

"After the fool had been past him once or twice he sort o' caught on and he boosted himself over the wall and started after the critter. Fool let

"After the fool had been past him once or twice he past him once or twice he sort o' caught on and he boosted himself over the wall and started after the critter. Fool let out a yell and run with the cent flippin' along through the dust. Uncle Seth has allus been quite a feller to chase the nimble copper, ye know. He put on speed and darned if he didn't slam up nigh enough to set his foot on the cent. The string broke and Uncle Seth picked up the cent, put it into his pants' pocket and went back to work contented as a pertater bug swingin' in the breeze on an Early Rose top. And when I left, the fool was goin' round bellerin' about how he'd got a bite but Jephson got away with the bait. That's—"

"Oh, that's fairly mean," remarked Ezra Pitts, "but from what I hear from the Walker deestrict I figger that Hen Pearson has sort or "A while ago Doc. Pinkham wanted to doctor her."

"I thought he was a veterrinary?" said Jote Bailey.

"Wall, he's allus been vet'rinary but he's got anxious to tackle something in the human critter line. Thinks he's a natural doctor and says he's got tired of doctrin' cows. Says it's too mussy bus'ness. Cow never'll take medicine without whooshin' all over anybody.

"Doc thought if he could fetch a good, tough old chronic gess out of the Vallent at Set 232.

There didn't seem to be anything choicer in the chronic line than Hen Pearson's wife. If he could cure her he figgered it would be better 'n a diplomy in the State Medical Association. "So he went 'round to see Hen. Said he'd like to take his wife's case.

"'Why,' says Hen, 'you hain't nothin' but a cow doctor'.

"'Wal, I've allus done a good job curin' cows, hain't I?' says Doc.

"'Yas, I'll admit I've allus heerd ye well spoken of in that line,' Hen said.

"'Wal, flesh and blood is the same the world over,' says the Doc. 'These city doctors are full of brummagem about no one bein' able to cure diseases except it's some one that's gone through a medical college. That's jest so they can corner the thing. But you know and I know that some of the best cures have been made by grammies who understand yarbs. Now there hain't nobody in this county that understands yarbs any better than I do.'

"Still ye hain't recognized as a doctor,' said Hen. 'They tell me that ye don't even know the difference between an allopath and a homeopath.'

even know the difference between an allopath and a homeopath.'
"'Don't, eh?' yelled the Doc. 'Bet ye a plug of to-bacco I can tell ye now right off the reel.' Hen didn't know himself but he said 'Go ahead!'
"'An allopath,' says Doc, 'is one that gets his medicines all over God's creation, in all paths. See?'

"'Yas,' says Hen.
"'Ye can't depend on them critters so much.
Ha't on 'em don't know what they're dosin'

Ha'f on 'em don't know out.'

"'I've heern tell so', says Hen.

"'Now a homepath is a feller that gits his yarbs 'round home. I'm a homepath and I pick every yarb I use.'

"'Wal, I swum, ye do know more about doct'rin' than I thought ye did,' Hen said. 'But I've never heern tell of your practicin' any on human critters.'

""'That's jest it,' says the Doc. 'I want to work into a leetle such practice. Now your wife is the most critical case around here.'
"'That's so,' says Hen, commencin' to feel a leetle pride.

"'I'll take her case for a shillin' a visit, no cure, no pay—furnish my own medicines.'

"'Can't think of it; says

Hen.

"'Why, if I don't cure her there ain't no charge.
You are all right in the thing,' said Doc.

"That ain't it,' says Hen.

"That ain't it,' says Hen.
"Ye'll have to hunt the country over to find such another chronic case as Mis' Pearson. It's the best chance for a doctor to practice ye ever heerd tell of. Now what ye need is practice. If ye want to start in and practice on her I'll let ye do it for a shillin' a visit!"
"Wall, he and Doc. they argued and dickered for two days and what do you suppose the upshot was? They split the difference and Doc. is putting in his time against her'n."
"What does she say about it?" asked Cap'n Jote.

Jote.
"Nothin'. She's too sick."

"Nothin'. She's too sick."
"Hain't gettin' better any, ther?"
"No, but Doc. says she's staying sick jest to spite him. Says she's took a miff ag'in him and won't take his medicines. He leaves a tin milk pail full every day and his prescription says 'Take one dipper full ev'ry ha'f hour.'
"But Doc. hain't discouraged. He says he keeps running ag'in seeh segaint the could do a thing with their garget. He's full of resources."

"You bet he is," said Wack Spofford. "I remember the time when Uncle Howes fell off the roof and broke his leg. Wa'n't any other doctor to be had and they called in Doc. Pinkham. Fust thing he said after lookin' at Iral's tongue was, 'Reckin' he must have lost his cud. Seems like a bad attack of colic.' Ye see Uncle Iral was takin' on suthin' powerful. Some one broke in and told him that Iral's leg was broke and he didn't seem a mite bothered. Said the colic was wust just then. But he tackled the leg and fin'ly after a good deal of twistin' he got it set. 'Twas broke above the knee. Iral kept complainin' that it did't feel right. 'Taint no wonder it didn't.

"When they took the splints off they found that the joint doubled out behind like a cow's hind leg. Doc forgot himself and thought he was doin' a vet'rinary job."

Water Lilies.

How to Start a Water Garden

BY THOMAS L. PECK.

O own and to enjoy than one dollar (without including time), was a revelation of what one can accomplish by a little ingenuity.

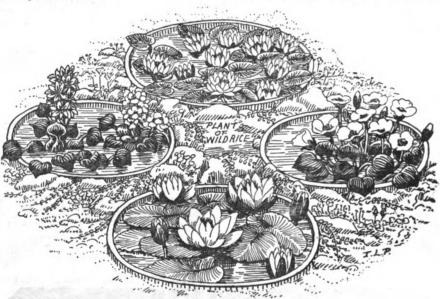

True, in this little garden there were no rare exotics from the Amazon or the Nile; no night-blooming Nymphaes or Lotus Flower. The maker of it had confined himself to the native water plants of our own country, mostly, which cost but a few cents each, but the effect was entrancing nevertheless. There is, indeed, in this form of gardening something so novel and interesting, that everybody after the first experiment becomes so enthusiastic that before long they construct a permanent tank for their favorites. Just such a success can be achieved by any one else, and just now is the right time of the year to begin.

The beauty spot I am about to describe—a sketch of which appears herewith—was formed of barrels sawed in half (molasses barrels are the best), one-half barrel placed opposite to the other. The two other halves were much shallower, being not more than nine inches deep, the first two being about ten inches deep, the first two being about ten inches deep. The deep tubs contained water lilies, and the shallow ones water hyacinths and water poppies. They were let in the ground up to their rims.

fall and grown in glass vessels with about three inches of soil in the bottom kept in place by a few stones and shells they make beautiful house plants. The same thing can be done with the water poppy which adorned the remaining shallow tub. This pretty aquatic plant has bright lemon-yellow petals and black stamens. Its flowers stand several inches out of the water and it also is very free blooming. They are sold at fifteen cents each. About four inches of soil and three inches of water is enough for both the water hyacinths and the water poppies. In the space in the center was growing a young plant of wild rice which cost ten cents each. They are graceful drooping weed-like plants and later in the year it bears graceful panicles of bloom. Other plants could of course be substituted for the wild rice, such as cannas, or even a few seeds of Ricinus Communis planted now would produce plants large enough this season. The space around the tub was filled in with rocks, and a few trailing plants were growing over them here and there, such as sweet alyssum trailing nasturtium, verbenas, flax plant etc., etc. And that was all there was to it. It was a piece of gardening accomplished at little outlay and with modest materials, but it was a refreshing combination, suggesting coolness and repose, and all manner of pleasant things. The contrast between the pure white of the pond lilies seen against their fresh green leaves, and the lilac, purple and lavender of the water hyacinths in turn enlivened by the yellow of the water poppies, and harmoniously blended by the drooping narrow leaves of the wild rice plant, formed a group not easily forgotten. As to the culture it is quite easy. The best soil is rich loam and decayed stable manure in equal quantities or rich pond mud if handy. Put in eight inches of soil and cover with one inch of sand to keep down the manure, lay in the roots and straighten out the small fibres, cover two inches deep with soil, and fill the tub with water gently poured in. In winter the tubs should be cellar to prevent freezing, fill them with water when putting them away.

There is one particular kind of water lily mention of which should not be omitted, and that is the Egyptian Sacred Lotus, see illustration. A few years after they were introduced in America (about twenty years ago), the tubers cost three dollars each, but they can now be bought for seventy-five cents each. Anyone caring to go to the additional expense, would do well to grow one. It would add very much to the bed just described if planted in a tub in the center of the bed. It is a plant of wonderful and rare beauty and does not float on the water like a nymphae, but

WATER GARDEN AT LITTLE COST.

The situation was sunny for only part of the day, but if the sun had shone on the bed all day it would have been better still. In one of the deeper barrels grew a fine specimen of our native American pond lily, Nymphae Odorata. It was thriving just as well in a tub as it does in its favorite habitat a slow-moving stream; indeed, it seems that water lilies bloom more continuously and the flowers are larger, when grown in a confined space, although it costs but a trifle, it is just as beautiful and interesting as the most rare extics, and in addition has a very sweet fragrance to recommend it. The pure white flowers of this specimen were six inches across and its leaves of vivid green were thirteen inches long. They are sold at twenty cents each. In the opposite tub was another fragrant water lily Nymphae Odorata minor, having much smaller flowers but a great number of them. It is one of the best for growing in tubs, being a very continuous and profuse bloomer and completely filling the tub.

One of the shallower tubs contained two plants of the water Hyacinth one being rosy lilac in color, and the other lavender-blue. These are

One of the shallower tubs contained two plants of the water Hyacinth one being rosy illac in color, and the other lavender-blue. These are very remarkable and curious plants. From each crown appears neat rosettes of green leaves, the stems of which are inflated with air and bulge out in a peculiar manner enabling the plant to float. The flowers are produced on large upright spikes which stand up out of the water and look very much like a Dutch hyacinth. The blue variety is a rich stands up boldly sometimes to the height of five or six feet. It grows well in a tub and although a native of tropical regions it is quite hardy in this country. It will also flower the same season it is planted which must not be until warm weather. When the flowers first open they look like immense white tulips, afterwards the lower part of the petals become white, shading off into pink. It is a very vigorous and healthy grower and the flowers are deliciously fragrant. Lack of space forbids more than mere mention of many other extremely interesting water plants which can be obtained at a little cost. Besides the white nymphaes there are many colored ones—pink, purple, blue, red, yellow and rose, costing from one to fifteen dollars each. Other water plants are Umbrella Grass or Cyperas costing fifteen cents and Egyptian Paper plant twenty-five cents, also the Water Snowflake costing twenty cents, Parrot's Feather, having long, trailing green stems and Floating Lettuce, each costing fifteen cents.

To destroy snails and prevent scum it is well to place in the tub a few fish, silver fish, or gold fish, or the common sunfish and a few frogs.

AN OLD BRAIDED RUG.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY HOLMAN F. DAY.

Copyright, 1902, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

'Twas a social event with a radiant hue,
When Anderson married Kate;
'Twas a marriage of love and of fortunes, too,
And the presents were gems and plate.
They were tiered and displayed in their splendid array,
A heap for a miser to hug,
Yet there in the glitter and gloss there lay
A queer old braided rug.
An old braided rug of a motley design, patiently plaited and sewed,
Labor of many a weary day, yet a homely thing and rude;

Labor of many a weary day, yet a homely thing and rude;
The bride had declared it should never be shown—this gift from the humble aunt
Who was hidden away on a hillside farm, at war with the wolf of Wart.
But the bridegroom patted the faded rug. "My dearie," he gently said,
"In valuing hearts forget the gold and appraise good thoughts instead.
Here with the rest should lie her gift, and equal among our friends Should rank the one who has wrought this rug with blistered finger ends. It stands for her hours of patient toil, an humble but loving task,
Where gold and gems and silver plate mere careless friendships mask.
For often I've found when the trial comes, his comfort the rich man hugs
And the friends who are steady and staunch are those who are plain as their braided rugs."

The curious smiled on the quaint old thing

The curious smiled on the quaint old thing
As the guests went thronging past,
And many a quip and jocular fling
At the braided rug were cast.
And wonder spread as to how and why
Such freak from the past was dug;
And it was feast all day for tongue and eye,
—That queer old braided rug.
An old braided rug with a hit-or-miss stripe,
homely enough, 'tis true,
But with memories twined in its even braids—and heart-aches, if one but knew!
There were snips and strips from her wedding gown, peeping from plaited strands,
And watered by tears for the old, old days, as she wrought with her aching hands.
There were gay little remnants of cast-off frocks
the babies outgrew so fast;
Treasured a life-time in bureau drawers, and used in the rug at last; The curious smiled on the quaint old thing

Treasured a life-time in bureau drawers, and used in the rug at last;
Some from the garb that was laid away for newer and trousered pride.
Some from a dress that was packed with tears when their little maid had died;
Wedding waist-coat of him she loved, brave and strong and true,
Strips from his humble garb of toil and faded Union blue;
Twisted and braided and stitched and sewed—wrought with the heart-strings' tug!
But only the mock of the careless guests—a queer old braided rug.

A Postal Currency.

A unique feature in congressional legislation this session is presented in the promotion of a postal currency. The provisions of the "post check" currency bill, now pending in Congress, provides for printing the one, two and five dollar bills in the future with blank spaces on the face. These bills of course pass from hand to hand before the blanks are filled. When it is desired to send one in the mails the blanks are filled in with the name of the payee, his city and state, a 2-cent postage stamp is placed in another blank space and canceled with the initials of the sender in ink, the name of the sender is signed on the back, and presto! his money has suddenly ceased to exist as currency and has been transformed into a check on the United States government, having all the safety of any bank check, and ready for inclosure in his letter. When the payee receives this check he treats it just as he would any other check—indorses it, goes to the nearest bank or post office and deposits it or has it cashed.

The paid check finally reaches the Treasury Department, when it is replaced by a new one with the spaces unfilled. This keeps the circulation at par. No change whatever is made in the financial policy of the government, the only change being in the character of the printing on the bills of five dollars and under.

The bill also provides for the issue of $75,000,000 of fractional currency, with blank spaces similar to the larger denominations, in place of an equal amount of money of larger denominations, presumably twenty and fifty-dollar bills. The provision under the new system for a continual re-issue insures clean money both in the fractional currency and in the larger bills. The government fee on the five, ten, fifteen, twenty-five and fifty-cent pieces is to be one cent each.

The system has the approval of many officials, and is indorsed by a long list of manufacturers and business houses throughout the country. Publishers and farmers are especially interested, in that the new currency promises an easy way

COMFORT'S AT-HOME LAWYEK, wherein will be carefully and correctly solved any legal problem which may be submitted. All opinions given herein, will be prepared at our expense by eminent counsel.

Law suits can frequently be avoided by timely and judicious advice concerning matters in dispute; this, however, can only be done by one who is fully conversant with his or her legal rights and privileges. This department will also prove of great value and interest from an educational standpoint, as in it will be answered any proper legal question that may be propounded.
Inasmuch as it is one of the principal missions of COMFORT to aid in upbuilding and upholding the sanctity of the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to divorce.

other than a subscriber, wishes to take advantage of this privilege, it may be done by sending twenty-fice (25) cents, in silver or stamps, for an annual subscription to COMFORT thus obtaining all the benefits which our subscribers enjoy including a copy of the magazine for one year.

Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any legal question, privately mailed, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing the same to "THE EDITOR, COMFORT'S ATHOME LAWYER," Augusta, Maine, and in reply a carefully prepared opinion will be sent in an early mail.

Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons seeking advice in this column but not necessarily for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

W. H. B.—If your mother left a will, the farm in question would have to be disposed of under the terms of such will. If, however, no will was left, then under the facts as stated in your letter the farm would belong to you and your brother jointly. Your interest in it would be as great as his. If up to this time you have received nothing from him, you should consult a lawyer and bring an action against him to compel him to account to you for your share of the past profits of the farm as well as for your share of its present value. Inasmuch as your mother died twenty years ago, you should not delay any longer in case you intend to take legal action.

B. A.—The Public School System, not only in Maine, but all over the country as well, is uniform in its operation and is intended for the benefit of all alike. No one person is entitled to additional advantages over another. In case you have any cause for complaint, call on your County Superintendent of Schools. You ask whether scholars can study Algebra and bookkeeping in the common schools. These branches are usually taught in the high schools. The course of instruction in such schools is prescribed by the local school boards and in case the topics mentioned are covered by the curriculum of the high school in your County, they are undoubtedly taught there.

high school in your County, they are undoubtedly taught there.

Mrs. A. W. N.—As a rule, peaceable and continuous occupation of real estate and payment of taxes thereon, for upwards of twenty years, gives one in possession thereof a right to claim title thereto; at the same time this rule is subject to many exceptions and conditions. Under the facts as you state them, inasmuch as no valid title was ever given by your grandmother, the chances are that your property could either be recovered for you or at least a good settlement could be made in your behalf. If you will send the editor of this column further information telling him where the property is located and such further facts as you may care to give him, he will investigate your chances of recovery for you.

Ruby, Va.—You can certainly collect from your late employer all money that is due you under your contract of hiring, as well as full legal interest for all payments which have been withheld from you. In case you paid out money in hiring additional help and your employer knew of this fact and acquiesced therein, or at least took no exception thereto, and found no fault therewith, he must recimburse you for all payments which you made in that regard.

W. D. J.—If the property in question was deeded to your father and the deed filed for record and your father has never disposed of the property by deed or lost it through legal proceedings, the chances are that he can recover the property from the parties in possession of it. It may be that the parties in possession now hold a tax title and if so, prompt action should be taken on your or your father's part to recover the property.

E. A. H.—You ask whether a man who is drawing a pension can be placed under the care of a guardian if he spends all his money for drink and other foolishness. The fact that a man is getting a pension is not a license to squander his property. If the Court in the County where the party lives finds such party to be a spend-thrift and incompetent to manage his affairs, the court will certainly appoint a guardian or conservator over him.

will certainly appoint a guardian or conservator.

A husband has no right to order his wife and child to leave the house. He is their proper support and instead of compelling them to leave the house, he should both as a matter of right and as a matter of law furnish them a comfortable home and make such provision for their care as is consistent with their station in life. If a man is so brutal as to drive his wife and infant child from his home there is no court in civilization that will give him the custody of the child.

M. E. D.—You ask whether a school teacher whose give him the custody of the child.

M. E. D. -You ask whether a school teacher whose school has been closed on account of sickness by the local authorities can recover pay for the time during which the school is closed. This depends entirely upon his contract with the school trustees. As a rule teachers are hired by the school year which would cover a period of from eight to ten months, the contract being that they are to be paid monthly. Under such a state of facts the teacher in question can recover his pay. On the other hand if he is hired from month to month only, and was told that his services were dispensed with when the school was closed, he would have no cause of action against the school board for salary during the time the school was closed. If you will write the editor of this column he will be pleased to advise you further.

E. E. G.—It has several times been decided that it is

B. E. G.—It has several times been decided that it is illegal to impose a tax on agents selling goods for a house elsewhere. The Constitution of the United States states that no law should be passed that shall in any way interfere with commerce between the different states, consequently, the Supreme Courts of many of the States have decided that a local tax imposed for selling goods is illegal.

o. G. S.—The Postal rules and regulations provide that if a letter have a special delivery stamp on it, but one effort need be made to deliver it. In case the address is not found at the first attempt, the mail becomes simply ordinary matter and is treated as such. There is no regulation for leaving a notice of a special delivery letter.

ordinary matter and is treated as such. There is no regulation for leaving a notice of a special delivery letter.

C. M. J.—You would not be entitled to a pension under the facts stated in your letter unless you can prove that you were entirely dependent upon your relative for your maintenance and support. Even then, it is questionable whether at this time, after the happening of the circumstances mentioned in your letter, the pension would be allowed. This is a very doubtful proposition with the chances much against you.

M. A. D.—Under the facts as stated in your letter, the father can bring an action against the son to recover the with legal interest thereon. Inasmuch as the contract between the father and son was never carried out by reason of the son's neglect and legal refusal to record the lease mentioned, the original agreement was never consummated and in consequence thereof the advance of the pension money stands simply as a loan made by the father to the son which he can at once recover back in an action brought for that purpose.

F. J. D.—Inasmuch as the fence has remained in its present place for upwards of 30 years with the consent of all parties interested, according to your letter, it could only be moved now by the express consent of the owners of the property on either side of it. 30 years is a good long time to wait to rectify a mistake; the law always favors diligence and looks with disfavor on neglect of this sort. A Court of justice would hardly compel the fence line to be changed without very strong reasons for so doing as well as a reasonable explanation for the delay.

A. B.—From the facts as stated in your letter, there lay.

A. B.—From the facts as stated in your letter, there seems never to have been any promise or agreement of marriage between the young folks in question. You do not state in your letter what is the basis of the action brought against the young man, whether the suit is one for breach of promise for marriage or for some other cause, nor do you state by what process the young man's property is tied up. Under the laws of the State of Illinois, where you say this case is pending, the real estate can only be tied up by attachment proceedings. Under the meagre facts which you have stated, it would be simply guess work to answer you more in detail. If you will send the editor of this column such further facts as you care to give him he will cheerfully advise you more in detail.

saveral centuries ago.

H. J. F.—Under the facts as you state them, the farm which was sold at auction, was mortgaged before the date of the mortgager's marriage. Inasmuch as the interest of the mortgage attached to the property prior to any dower right on the part of the mortgagor's wife she—that is the wife—cannot assert a dower right as against any right of the mortgagor. In other words, the wife never had any interest in the property covered by the 1st. mortgage superior to the interest of the mortgage; her only interest in that property was in that equity. When the property was foreclosed, the equity was wiped out so that the wife is left without any rights whatever in that property. In signing the other three mortgages she divests herself of her dower interest in the property in case of a foreclosure thereof. Under proper foreclosure proceedings the purchaser would take the property free from any interest which the wife might have therein. By signing the mortgages, she deeds away to the mortgagee her dower interest.

RAPID-FIRE RIFLE.

CLUB OF FOUR. A New King All Steel Combination Rifle for Birds or Came using shot that can be obtained anywhere at a trifling expense, also shoots darts making it desirable for outdoor target practice or parlor amusement or it can be used in any part of the house with perfect safety, making a practical and entertaining form of evening amusement for the boys and girls as well as older folks. There is no smoke, odor or dust from this gun, it is endorsed by army officers as the best mechanical rifle ever produced and the possession of one of our accurate shooting air rifles makes a boy manly and affords him an excellent means of successfully competing with his chums for marksman's honors as well as teaching him the use of a rifle. Remember this is a combination gun, so your boy should have one be old or young. If he is sick in the house he can shoot darts and keep out of mischief or go into the woods for game and get robust and healthy besides.

SPECIAL. Send at once for sample copies of our big monthly and subscription blanks and canyass amons the neighbors. For a club of four yearly subscribers at the popular price of 25c. each, $1.00 in all, we will send one of these King Pneumatic Rifles as a present, all charges paid, guaranteeing absolute satisfaction.

Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Remember the above is a real gun nearly three feet long. It looks like a gun and shoots like a gun.

[So many inquiries are made by "Comfort" readers concerning real estate (country and city) farms and locations for homes that this column has become a necessity and here we shall be glad to answer all questions.)

Paid-up subscribers who desire to make a change in their present situation or are in any way uncomfortable in their abode and want information about any particular location in any State in the Union can address "The Comfort Home Finder," Augusta, Maine, and we will try and serve them.

Mrs. E. B. K., Pleasant Hill, Mo. For information concerning California lands, write to Secretary, California State Board of Trade, Union Ferry Building, San Francisco, asking for circulars for whatever particular section of the state you wish to know about.

Building, San Francisco, asking for circulars for whatever particular section of the state you wish to know about.

L. B. Donham, Lesueur, Minn.—Write to H. W. Weiss, Manager of Immigration, Emporia, Va., for information and circulars of Virginia lands and you will get a full supply from a reliable source.

C. H. Reese, Henley, Ark.—You will find pretty much the same conditions existing in California that you will smore an agricultural than most other states because of the class of farming there, much of it requiring capital to begin with, not to mention the expense of getting there. The opportunities for a small farmer are better in Texas, we should say. If you will write to S. F. B. Morse, Houston, Texas, he will probably put you on the track of finding a farm that will suit your means.

Mrs. Mary McIntyre, Logansport, Ind.—Nashville, N. C. is a thriving town with good schools, and all the advantages of towns of its size, population 14,600, with the addition of a large floating population of wealthy invalids, housed in fine hotels. In the summer the town loses its northern people who make it a summer resort. We would say it ought to be a good location for a florist who knew how to conduct an establishment of the fashionable kind. Land in the immediate vicinity is not cheap, nor is it good for farming in a general way, though it would be all right for a fruit or flower farm if you had the means sufficient to put the ground in order. Land in other parts of North Carolina is cheap and good, and is adapted to fruit raising. It is a healthful state, back from the lowlands of the coast, and in many respects is one of the most promising states in the Union. Write to Secretary State Board of Agriculture, Raleigh, N. C., for copy of "Hand Book of North Carolina," and it will be a revelation to you.

A. N. B., Pulaski, Tenn.—There are abandoned farms in New Hampshire which may be had for as low as three dollars an acre, but should say that they would scarcely pay a large profit on the investment, as a farm. However, th sa summer homes by persons who live in the cities. Places of from fifty to two hundred acres with good buildings on them may be had at from $800 to $1.50.

You can get a book of them of Agriculture. Concord, N. H.

Mrs. A. S. Powell, Portland, Oregon.—If you could get a good farm in western Texas there is no reason why it would not be a good place for a home, provided you do not care for remoteness from a city as large as Portland. You can get information from any of the towns and asking him to hand it to a reliable real estate dealer. Information in detail can only be had by applying direct to those who are on the spot.

M. L. K., Harrisburg, Pa.—You can reach the York river country in Virginia by steamer from Baltimore, daily at and in that section is plenty and cheap and good. Write to W. R. Broadus, West Point, Va. for circular.

Shipper, New York City.—Cannel coal lands in Kentucky are not as cheap as they were. Small railroads are penetrating the mountains and opening up country and the owners are realizing that their property is vally of particulars.

Alexandra K., Havry, for particulars.

Alexandra K., Havry, for particulars.

Alexandra K., Havry, for particulars, benchmarked to start a grocery store there you would have to conduct it on first class principles, as many, if not most of your customers, would compare you with what they know and see of New York stores. Still if you know the real is preferable, however, to seek a town at a greater distance from the city ideas and the city competition.

Hustler, Springfield, Ills.—If you are the "hustler" you represent yourself to be, and we suppose you are, we would advise your going south instead of west. All the hustlers seem to choose the west, and the country is full of them. They are much scarcer in the south, and then an unitained to the main chance and energy of body and mind to keep up with it. Make a trip down that way and look the ground over.

E and the country is full of them. They are much scarcer in the south, and the number of the main chance

Thomas K., Batavia, Ohio.—You will find Sedalia, Mo., a very good town of 15,000 people, but do not open a store there. There are too many stores there now, and with your two sons who have had experience on a farm, you can do better putting them to raising broom-corn and running a broom factory yourself on their product. A machine for making brooms costs little and with one man to help you, who knows how to make brooms, you can build up a good local trade and become a producer which is much better than being a store-keeper. With the $44,500 you can raise, you will find yourself very comfortable, as property is not expensive

For the benefit of our readers who live in the smaller towns and remote communities, Comfort proposes the organization of Comfort Clubs whose object shall be to add to the comfort of living by bringing people together for their mutual instruction, improvement and amusement.

Knowing that social pleasures are lacking in the smaller places more because people do not know how to organize and what to do that is interesting and pleasing, than because they do not care for such things, Comfort will undertake to suggest ways and means by which the young people, at least, may pass many pleasant evenings which would otherwise hang heavily.

First: The clubs, to be known as Comfort Clubs, are to have their membership from among subscribers to Comfort, and ten persons or less may constitute a Club. In communities where there are more than ten eligibles, Clubs A, B, C etc., may be organized, the objects of these divisions being to make it possible for sets of persons to make up their own crowds, for such meetings as they may wish to have. But each month there must be a regular meeting of the whole Club at which all members may attend and take part in the exercises.

Second: The monthly meeting should be held in some large room (church or town hall) and members are regular meeting of the whole Club at which all members may attend and take part in the exercises.

Second: The monthly meeting should be held in some large room (church or town hall) and members are to read, recite, sing, play on some instrument, or act a short piece, the whole to conclude with some interesting game which Comport will present. Comport will also provide the program each month for the monthly meeting, so that members need only carry out the program which will be furnished them. Division meetings may be held at private houses of members of the divisions, and once a week if so desired.

Third: The officers of Comfort Clubs shall consist of President, Vice President, Secretary and Treasurer, four nall, and to be elected by the Club, once a year. There are to be no fees of any kind, but if at any time the Club wishes to raise money for any charity, small admittance may be charged at the usual monthly meeting. This can only be done by vote of the Club. Every membershall be entitled to invite two persons, not members, to attend any meeting, general or division.

Fourth: Each member shall wear a badge or button indicating membership, Comport agreeing to furnish appropriate badges without cost to members.

These general rules, which will be modified and improved each proper and control of the control of the propers of the propersion of the propersion

These general rules, which will be modified and improved as the needs of Clubs develop, are now given as a basis upon which to organize the ploneer Clubs, and COMPORT will be pleased to hear from our lady readers all over the land concerning their willingness to undertake the good work. COMPORT will also be glad to render all the assistance in its power to aid the cause of making life cheerier and brighter and increasing good will and good fellowship among mankind. A special prize will be awarded to the first club organizing and reporting to this office, which organization may take place immediately upon receipt of this notice. Various annual prize, to be determined later, will be awarded to Clubs for excellence in attendance, numbers, &c.

Address all communications to Comfort Club Editor, Comport, Augusta, Maine.

Method of Organization of Clubs.

Let the person undertaking the organization notify sit or more subscribers to ComPoRT at the same postoffice to meet at a designated house, or room, and when they have come together, simply state the object of the organization of the club, as announced in CompoRT and gettle sense of the meeting as to organization. If a majority flavor it, proceed at once to organization by naming two or more persons, male or fermale as candidates for President, first. Then pass slips of blank paper around for each person to write thereon the name of his or her choice for the office, and the one receiving the highest number of votes shall be declared president. Proceed in the same way for Vice President, Secretary and Treasurer. Then the person who has called the meeting retires and the new officers will take charge, the President in the chair, conducting the meeting, and the Secretary acting as clerk making the minutes. The President will announce the program and call off the order of business naming those who are set down as taking individual parts.

The main idea is to have this part of the club's work as the secret of the main idea is to have this part of the club's work as Method of Organization of Clubs.

parts.

The main idea is to have this part of the club's work as simple as it can possibly be, so that members will find the duties a pleasure rather than a burden, the object of the club being the greatest comfort to the greatest number.

Comfort Club Game for June Meeting.

Comfort Club Game for June Meeting.

An interesting and instructive game, in which all can take part and which is particularly happy in affording a subject for general conversation, is what is called "The Portrait Game." In this the president of the club, with such assistance as he or she may select, cuts from newspapers and magazines some thirty or forty, more or less, portraits of well-known people which he numbers and fastens to the walls of the room with pins, so as not to injure the paper or plaster. He has a list of the names of the persons pictured, numbered to correspond with the numbers on the pictures. Slips of paper, numbered in blank, are distributed to all present and they go about the room, which is now a portrait gallery, guessing who are represented on the walls, and setting down the names of their guesses opposite the number on their slips. The person guessing all wins the prize, and the one next gets the second prize. The one guessing the lowest number gets the "booby prize". Any small article, book, piece of china, etc., makes a nice prize, besides the glory of yinning. Lots are to be drawn for the prize when more than one is correct. This game may be also played with pictures of the well-known advertisements seen in the periodicals and newspapers.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

NDOUBTEDLY black taffeta is the material which carries the day which carries the day this season. In its wide widths it is suited to all sorts of gar-ments; applied to silk tucks and stitched, its plaits enjoy a new vogue. The more simvogue. The more simple pale tots are further trimmed with rather wide straps of black cloth laid across the tucks. These shapes are stitched all over and bordered with nar-row velvet ribbon or silk cord. An arrange-silk cord. An arrangement extended to the lower portion of the basque, the collar and cuffs. A somewhat more elegant trimming is provided by bands of silk covered with black lace insertion bordered with velvet comete.

For the very smartest black silk paletots, habit coats and boleros, open work embroidery will be generally worn. The transparent portions are backed with net. In many cases the entire garment will be cut out in scrolls worked round. In this case, fancy nets are chosen for grounding, such as spotted Greek net, lined with surah.

with surah.

Velvet ribbon, from one to one and one-half inches wide, is much used for trimming. The painted belts, into which the bloused boleros are set, are sometimes in plain velvet, but the habit basque at the back is trimmed like the bodice. Colored taffeta is also used, preference being given to what is termed "cloth colors."

When the embroidery is not extended to the coat itself, the black scrolls are sometimes mounted on a foundation of white etamine.

There is also a wide choice of white and ecru embroideries and new guipures with netted grounds, all of which find a place in the decoration of cuffs and collars, both of garments and costumes. Elaboration of trimming and simplicity of outline are the distinguishing features of the new season, and it is difficult to realize that any

The turnings and twistings, the gatherings and noistings, the folds. plaitings, the folds and the puffings of silk chiffon and even of cloth it-self, are innumerself, are innumerable. And besides such decorations we have at our disposal printed velvet galon, the most popular being white and black with a black spot; braids of many sorts; rosettes of ribbon and tassels; while other pretty effects are achieved by conventional designs of glace on net foundation, these be-other pretty effects are achieved by conventional designs of glace on net foundation, these being used to border glace costumes, or to trim dresses which are made of net. Most effective are ribbon roses worked on lace foundations, and lace of all kinds, notably real lace, continues to occupy the pedestal of popularity.

The most favored of the new fabrics, unquestionably, are voile and flowered mousseline and these are seen in most delightful colorings. We are to employ flowered mousseline to make entire costumes, to make skirts to glace coats, and also to trim our hats, while of course it suggests itself as being pre-eminently suitable for the manufacture of fichus.

Last year the authorities tried to bring into favor painted lace, but they met with little success. This year it is once again being pushed forward and as a novelty may be commended, though it certainly lacks any other charms.

Gold and silver are to have a royal display on our evening dresses and in combination with lace and chiffon either has attractions.

Besides painting mousseline we paint crepe de chine in the most beautiful and delicate of colors and floral pattern, while very excellent effects are achieved with gold thread woven

Pompadour and Dresden silks are used for bands on skirts, and these are bordered with stitched strappings of the cloth or material;

HE funeral services of the late Robert G. Ingersoll consisted in the reading of selections from his own works and of an oration which he had himself delivered over the dead body of a brother, some time ago. To Chris-tians this seems barbaric, but it would doubtless have better suited Ingersoll himself, were he able to see and know of these exercises, banging in long ends covered with velvet ap- than any other form of service.

Adrift in New York.

"Yes, sir; but he throwed a piece of paper out'n de window, sayin' he was kep' a prisoner here. A young man picked it up, and came to de house to ax about it."

Curt is looked alarmed.

"What did you say?" he inquired apprehensively.

"Told him de boy was crazy as a loon—dat he tried to kill his mother las' week, and had a carvin'-knife hid in his room."

"Good, Julius! I didn't give you credit for such a fertile imagination."

"What's dat, massa?" asked Julius, looking nuzzled.

"What's dat, massa?" asked Julius, looking puzzled.

"I didn't know you were such a skillful liar."
"Yah! yah!" laughed Julius, quite comprehending this compliment. "I reckon I can twis' de trufe pretty well, Massa Curtis!"
"You have done well, Julius," said Curtis, approvingly. "Here's a dollar!"
The negro was quite effusive in his gratitude. "What did the young man say?"
"He looked scared, I tol' him he could go up and see de boy if he wasn't afeared of the carvin'-knife, but he said he guessed he wouldn't—he didn't like crazy folks."
Curtis laughed heartily.
"So it all ended as it should. Did the boy make any more trouble?"
"Yes; he pounded and kicked till I had to go up and see what was de matter. I didn't give him no satisfaction, and I guess he went to bed."
"He ought to be in a deep sleep by this time.

"He ought to be in a deep sleep by this time. I will go up and see. Go up with me, Julius, for I may have to ask you to help me bring him down."

Though Julius was naturally a coward, he felt quite brave when he had company, and he at once went upstairs with Curtis Waring.

Curtis drew the bolt, and entering the chamber, his glance fell upon Dodger fast asleep on the bed.

"I am glad the boy did not undress," he said.

"It will save me a great deal of trouble. Now, Julius, you can take his feet and I will lift his head, and we will take him down-stairs."

"S'pos'n he wakes up, Massa Curtis?"

"He won't wake up. I took care the sleeping potion should be strong enough to produce profound slumber for eighteen hours."

"Seems as if he was dead," said Julius nervously.

ously.
"Tush, you fool! He's no more dead than you or I."

The hackman looked curious when the two men appeared with their sleeping burden, and Curtis felt that some explanation was required. "The boy has a very painful disease," he said, "and the doctor gave him a sleeping-draught. He is going abroad for his health, and, under the circumstances I think it best not to wake him up. Drive slowly and carefully to Pier No.—, as I don't want the boy aroused if it can be helped."

"All right, sir."

"Julius, you may lock the door and come with me. I shall need your help to get him on board the ship."

"All right, Massa Curtis."

"And mind you don't go to sleep in the carriage, you black rascal!" added Curtis, as he saw that the negro found it hard to keep his eyes open.

The journey was successfully accomplished, but it took an hour, for, according to directions, the hackmen did not force his pace, but drove slowly, till hereached the North River pier indicated.

Columbia—bound for San Francisco, round Cape Horn.

All was dark, but the second officer was pacing the deck.

Curtis Waring hailed him.

"What time do you get off?"

"Early tomorrow morning."

"So the captain told me. I have brought you a passenger."

"The captain told me about him."

"Is the stateroom ready?"

"Yes, sir. You are rather late."

"True; and the boy is asleep, as you will see. He is going to make the voyage for his health, and, as he has been suffering some pain, I thought I would not wake him up. Who will direct me to his stateroom?"

The mate summoned the steward and Dodger, still unconscious, was brought on board and quietly transferred to the bunk that had been prepared for him.

It was a critical moment to poor Dodger, but he was quite unconscious of it.

"What is the boy's name?" asked the mate.

"Arthur Grant. The captain has it on his list. Is he on board?"

"Yes; but he is asleep."

"I do not need to see him. I have transacted all necessary business with him—and paid the passage money. Julius, bring the valise."

Julius did so.

"This contains the boy's clothing. Take it to the stateroom, Julius."

"All right, Massa Curtis."

"What is your usual time between New York and San Francisco?" asked Curtis, addressing the mate.

"What is your usual time between New fork and San Francisco?" asked Curtis, addressing the mate.

"From four to six months. Four months is very short, six months is very long. We ought to get there in five months, or perhaps a little sooner, with average weather."

"Very well. I believe there is no more to be said. Good-night!"

"Good-night!"

"Good-night!"

"So he is well out of the way for five months!" soliloquized Curtis. "In five months much may happen. Before that time I hope to be in possession of my uncle's property. Then I can snap my fingers at fate."

The summer time has come again, my dears, and let us gather all the sweet June roses we may, and if we have no use for them ourselves, let us give them to those who are not so fortunate as we, and who get only the thorns.

fortunate as we, and who get only the thorns.

Now to our more serious talk, and the first letter I open is from a fourteen year old cousin in Groesbeck, Texas, who wants to be an actress and learn the trapeze. Dear me, child, you can't learn the trapeze, and you mustn't t'y to be an actress. It is all dreadfully hard work and full of sorrow, sometimes shame. Put it out of your thoughts utterly. Keep at your school work for a long time yet.

Buth, Lamar, Mo.—Tell the young man that the real engagement ring is a solitaire diamond. (2) There are quite as many blondes as brunettes, I fancy.

Blue Bell, Pierpont, N. H.—Don't marry a man younger than you are, unless it is your only chance. Dahlia, Tidioute, Pa.—It is quite proper to propose a walk to the young man. (2) Yes, any one may wear a cross for a necklace charm.

Pet, Manistee, Mich.—The only way to treat the man you describe, or any of his kind, is to have nothing to do with him.

Daisy, Cooper Heights, Ga.—The buggy ride is allowable in the country, but it is no longer fashionable in the city. (2) An afternoon caller should not remain until evening, unless he is specially asked to do so, and then he should go home early. (3) Yes.

(3) Yes.

Twins, Deer Lodge, Mon.—If the young man is able to support you and his mother has no right to object to your marrying him, then marry him if he is a good man. (2) A man engaged to a girl should not write to other girls, and he won't if he is really in love. (3) Yes, but not the best way to do.

B. and B., Gretna, N. Y.—Unless you are engaged to the young man he has no right to ask you not to accept the attention of other men. (2) The young man can go in the same party you are with. You could not go alone with him.

could not go alone with him.

Californian, Los Angeles, Cal.—Seventeen is too young to receive gentlemen's attention. (2) Don't think about yourself if you do not want to feel bashful. (3) There is no ordinary occasion for a young man to take a girl's arm with both hands.

Lottie, Pana, Ills.—Don't accept the young man's attention if he will not come into your house, but waits outside for you. He is a bumpkin that ought to go with the chickens.

to go with the chickens.

Zig Zag, Connamore, Ont.—Love begins when the right one comes along. (2) There is no set time when young men and women begin their lovemaking. (3) A lovers' spat does not count. Make up the quarrel and begin over again. (4) Better not marry a man younger than yourself.

Pussy Willow, Boston, Mass.—Really, Pussy, dear, I cannot tell you how to earn ten dollars in two months. Study the advertisements in the Boston papers; they ought to tell you. (2) It is all right to talk to the dentist. It will keep your mind off your teeth, that must hurt.

Gray Eyes, Houston, Texas.—Your teacher is not

Gray Eyes, Houston, Texas.—Your teacher is not a fit person to hold the position he does, and you should quit going to him, and should also tell your mother about him, and he should be dismissed from the school.

Daisy, Tatum, Va.—You should have written the young man a letter if you wished to hear from him.

Pussy, Farnham, Quebec.—A letter of apology should be answered accepting the apology.

Mabel, Lisabeula, Wash.—I have no recipe for polishing shells, but if you will use sandpaper first, then emery cloth, pumice stone and rottenstone, with plenty of "elbow grease" you can improve them very much. It would be better if you would write to some of the novelty dealers in Seattle for information. Some of them advertise in Seattle papers.

Mamma's Baby, Pay Down, Mo.—Don't write to in Seattle papers.

Mamma's Baby, Pay Down, Mo.—Don't write to any man you do not know, and to very few you do know. (2) The girl may ask the man to call, or he may ask her. (3) Better let the young man do the asking to go anywhere, unless there is a good reason for you to ask him. (4) It is always safe to suspect the man who asks the girl if she loves him. He should tell her he loved her, and ask her after he has committed himself.

Kitty, Enon, Va.—The place for girls of fourteen is not in society, but in school.

Two Girls, Sebastopol, Cal.—Do not ask the rich lady to help you unless you have some claim on her. If the education is worth having it is worth getting some other way than through charity.

Elise, Palatka, Fla.—You can ask a man for his photograph, but if he did not offer it, I would not ask him, unless near friends. (2) Yes, the man should write the first letter, or ask you to write, if you go away and he does not have your address. (3) It is wrong to bet, but if you bet and lose, pay.

Sweetheart, Valencia, Pa.—An unmarried woman is never an "old maid," she is a spinster. (2) Better take your parents' advice about the young man you think you love. (3) Photographs may be exchanged, if you know the man very well. (4) Buggy rides after church should not last longer than 10 o'clock.

There, my dears, all your questions are answered, except some that you will find in the column devoted to Etiquette. May life be pleasant to you and may we meet again and talk over our troubles and joys together. By by.

Etiquette and Beauty.

Elise, Palatka, Fla.—To improve your complex-on and remove blotches try oil of sweet almonds ion and remove blotches try oil of sweet almonds 200 grams, glycerine 10 grams, tincture of benzoin 5 grams, to be had at any drug store. Bathe your face in this three times a day. (2) In introductions always introduce the man to the woman unless the man is very venerable or very distinguished. In introducing women introduce the younger or less important to the elder or more important. Ordinarily when you are with a friend and another of the same sex joins you you introduce the newcomer to the other, but you may do as you please.

Girls in Blue, Laurel Dell, Cal.—If your hair is too oily it may be remedied by washing it in a weak solution of ammonia. Only a few drops to a basin of water, and do not use frequently, as it is injurious unless used very carefully. Borax is better to use, probably, after the first washing in ammonia. Put a teaspoonful, powdered, in a basin of warm water. Use about once a week. (2) The only way "to get out of the way of talking about other people" is to say only good things of them. Try this for a short time and note the result.

Country Girl, Du Quoin, Ills.—Why should the lady take the gentleman's hat when they go to church? Is he not able to take care of it himself? Of course, he is, and therefore you are not impolite to let him look after it himself.

to let him look after it himself.

Bessie, Farnham, Quebec.—Exercise great care in using hair removers. This one is recommended as good, but we do not insure it: Alcohol 12 grams, iodine 75 centigrams, Collodion 35 grams, essence of Turpentine 3 centigrams, Castor Oil, 2 grams. Apply once aday and do not leave on long enough to burn the skin. A good hair tonic is made of half pound of beef marrow, soaked in several waters, melted and strained; one ounce tincture of cantharides and twelve drops of oil of bergamot. Apply once or twice a day, or less if the scalp becomes sore. (2) For an oily skin use warm applications of borate of soda to be had of your druggist. Judging of what you say of the condition of your skin your blood is out of order and you should get a tonic from your physician. Ask him about it.

nim about it.

Fernleaf, Nashville, Tenn.—Inscribe nothing on the card accompanying the bouquet to the graduate except your name. Or you might put "To Mr.—from Miss—," so that if the bouquet became mixed with others its destination would be known. (2) There is no advantage in receiving an invitation to a public affair beyond the special recognition from some friend who wants to see you there. Do not acknowledge the receipt of the invitation.

recognition from some friend who wants to see you there. Do not acknowledge the receipt of the invitation.

Blue Eyes, Mankato, Kans.—Say "yes" or "no" as you feel disposed. (2) It is proper to ask a young man to call even though you are meeting him the first time. (3) In receiving an invitation of any kind that you cannot answer at once, simply say you will be glad to accept if you can, but you must find out first whether you can go or not. It is not necessary to explain further than that.

Fern, Farmer City, Ills.—A wedding ring should be plain, and, I suppose, may be worn at funerals. (2) The lady speaks first. (3) Either the host or hostess may answer the call at the door. Preferably the host, unless there is a reason for the hostess going. (4) See answer to "Bessie." (5) Massage.

Eleanor, Kernersville, N. C.—It is not necessary to thank the gentleman who asks you to dance with him though you may incidentally do so in accepting. You would not thank him in the same way you would if he offered you a glass of water. If he thanks you after the dance, you may say anything you please to make him feel that you appreciate his courtesy. There is no rule for such things. (2) It is wrong for any church member to dance when that church member has subscribed to the rules of the church which say that there must be no dancing. Nearly everybody nowadays does it, but that does not make it right. (4) If you do not think it is right to stand on the porch with the young man who has brought you home, tell him that you must go in, and say goodnight. Then leave him. He will not stay there very long after you are gone. (4) In the country and smaller cities it is not unusual to go to the front door with the departing guest. It is even done in the larger cities among less formal people. (5) Fattening foods are sugar, bread, rare beef, potatoes, water, butter and raw oils.

K. H. Consor, I. T.—The red color in your face cannot be bleached by external application. You must go deeper for a cure and get your blood in better condition. Consult a physician. See answer to "Elise" for a complexion formula.

Blue Eyes, Iuka, Miss.—Men leave the theater between acts, even though they are with ladies, but it shows lack of consideration, and is therefore impolite and wrong. (2) Girls should not receive attentions from men until they are eighteen, at least. (3) Nineteen year old girls do not usually give masquerade balls, though their mothers may do it for them. (4) Girls of sixteen should have chaperons. At this age their teachers should be their chaperons.

Our illustration gives you some idea of the appearance of the bag, but of course the real effect is the appearance when worn suspended from the belt where contrast can be observed.

The bags are now worn by every well-dressed woman everywhere in every walk and station of life. Of the many articles of use and ornament now necessary for "My Lady" nothing has been imported of late years more stylish, useful and absolutely essential than these Bags.

nothing has been imported of late years more stylish, useful and absolutely essential these Bags.

Ladies' dresses without pockets make these bags very useful for handkerchiefs, to carry the small change purse, car fare, pencil, memorandum pad, smelling bottle and every other small article one is likely to want to carry with them all the time.

Ladies with wealth and the finest jewels and clothing wear these side Chatelaine Bags made of SOLID SILVER, but for general use and attractiveness our premium bag is just as desirable and will outwear a more expensive and less strongly made bag.

We were fortunate in securing such a handsome bag to offer our readers, the bead work on these bags is most thoroughly done, handwork, each row is securely attached to the bag itself and they seem to make the bag outwear the ordinary leather chatelaine. Our illustration photographed direct from the Bag gives you a good idea of its appearance. The inside of the Bag is four and a half inches deep by four inches wide, the handsome belt hook is heavily embossed, oxydized silver plate and with the two chains from which the bag hangs the whole is complete and sure to please any lady.

CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

HE New Moon for the month occurs at about 9 minutes before 8 o'clock in the morning of the 5th day of July, Washington Time. At that moment the 21st degree of Leo will be rising and the 14th degree of Turus will be on the south meridian. The Sun is ruler of the 18th house with the Moon. Neptune, Mercury and Mars are also in the same house. Venus is ruler of the 18th house and is located therein: Jupiter is setting in the west near the descending horizon: Saturn is on the cusp of the 6th house: and Herschel stands on the 5th cusp.

The Sun, ruler of the scheme, is with the Moon, indicating more than usual harmony between the people and the governing authorities, and Venus also being in the 10th house indicates increase in glory and renown of the nation: sympathy of the Executive authority for the people and jealous advocacy of the people's interests and wellfare by authorities charged with the administration of the law: Jupiter on the 7th signifies increase of the marriage rate and probably union of notables high in station also some matrimonial engagement of persons of wealth.

Mars opposing Herschel, in the 11th and 5th houses, indicates more than ugual harm from explosions and cautions all engaged in holiday celebrations to have unusual care in handling fire and explosives, just before the national holiday as well as during the celebration. It is apprehended that the city of Boston will suffer from bad fires or bad accident at public sports in the first days of July.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR JULY, 1902.

JULY 1—Tuesday. Use the early morning for asking promotion in thy business and otherwise busy thyself in matters pertaining to thine employer or superior in authority: the afternoon is adverse formoney dealings or making any purchases for use or trade: sign no money obligations especially in the nature of accommodations.

2—Wsduesday. An excellent day: particularly fortunate for dealings with those employed in matters pertaining to amusements, wearing apparel and house furnishing or decoration: transact business concerning lands and houses: ask favor of thy landlord and buy fancy goods and fine wares for trade. If this be the anniversary of thy birthday the tender sentiments are likely to be pleasantly enlisted and agreeable advances in courtship are likely to be made in these passing weeks; the landscape painter should improve these moments and musical efforts will be successful.

3—Thursday. The middle hours of the day are the and musical efforts will be successful.

3—Thursday. The middle hours of the day are the best, in which purchases for trade may be conservatively made, and dealings with banks or persons of wealth should be conducted. New business now coming, offering great promises of gain, should be very carefully scrutized and is best postponed a little. Don't take the day for dealing with persons in political life or those in government positions; let the greatest care be exercised in handling ires, machinery, and all kinds of explosives, as there is extreme danger of violent accidents, fires, etc., as the latter hours of the day are passing and generally during the early days in July; keep out of dispute and put a bridle upon the passions.

4—Friday. Independence Day. An excellent day for 4—Friday. Independence Day. An excellent day for commercial dealings and bargaining, notwithstanding it is a legal holiday; intellectual enjoyments are in order and journeying and pleasure seeking will be successful and satisfactory.

5-Saturday. Urge business to the utmost, especially that pertaining to public matters; seek favor from thine employer and ask for promotion in business.

6-Sunday. An unfavorable day, conducive to do-estic inquietudes and not promising of very agreeable eligious discourse.

7-Monday. Deal in fancy and ornamental goods, engage in the elegant and nice avocations and attend to musical and artistic matters; look out for the pennies during the middle hours of the day, when thy purchases should be only for actual needs; have no money transactions or dealings with wealthy persons.

5—Tuesday. Urge business vigorously during this day: make contracts, travel, pursue literary and scientific undertakings: deal with booksellers, lawyers, printers and mathematicians: sign writings of consequence and urge all correspondence.

9—Wednesday. Musical and artistic pursuits and the elegant occupations generally suffer peculiar annoyances and embarrassments during the forenoon, when no contracts should be made for the purchase of wearing apparel or any artistic wares; use the afternoon for dealing with thine employer and with persons in offices of trust or honor.

trust or honor.

10—Thursday. Form no hasty conclusions in business during this day: litigation and contention are likely to interfere seriously with the happy outcome of affairs of magnitude or importance now begun, especially if they pertain to any of the mechanical, chemical or manufacturing interests: the literary pursuits are not favored and contracts for literary work are best not entered into; avoid all excitement in speech and do not expect satisfactory correspondence or favor from persons in the intellectual callings.

intellectual callings.

II—Friday. One of the best days of the month. It is especially recommended for the purchase of goods for trade and for transactions with persons of means and prominence: deal in fancy and ornamental goods: engage in the elegant and fine avocations; sue the fair and seek money accommodations, particularly during the afternoon and evening. If this be the anniversary of thy birthday thou hast before thee better business advantages and more agreeable social experiences.

12—Saturday. Use the day after 10 o'clock in the forencon for dealing in metal, machinery, chemicals, and cutlery, also for pursuit of the mechanical trades and inventions: deal with military men, machinists, surgeons, tanners and electricians: the late afternoon is unfortunate for bargaining for houses or lands or having any dealings in agricultural or mining products.

13—Sunday. An excellent day for the improvement of the mind and for proper appreciation of the merits of literary and scientific productions: pulpit effort will abound in eloquence and prove effective through religious

11-Monday. Make no contracts of consequence diring this day and be very careful in the use of the pen, postponing important correspondence until the morrow, where possible: those who speculate with their money on this day need not be surprised if disappointment cames and general conditions bid thee pause before enging in any matter of great importance. Dramatists, musicians, artists, jewelers, upholsterers, and furniture dealers are adversely affected just now for a season—experience losces or embarrassments and will need to exercise unusual caution in all their acts: it will be well for theatrical managers and artists if they defer for a short time entering into important professional engagements: let the fair sex shun any matrimonial engagement for a season, if their desire be for domestic peace or harmony in the marriage relation, particularly if they claim this as the anniversary of their birth or if born about the 11th of January, 17th of April, 30th of May, 17th of July, 18th of October, or 1st of December, of pastyears.

15—Tuesday, Press thy business vigorously during this day, particularly such as concerns houses and lands: deal in such commodities as coal, iron, petroleum, wood, lumber, lead, wool, and grain, and, with discretion, in mining stocks, provided thy nativity is favorable also in this time: make contracts for building and repairing: deal with persons engaged in fiduciary capacities and enter into shipping contracts.

enter into shipping contracts.

16—Wednesday. Shun the matters recommended for the previous day, during the forenoon, but as the afternoon advances give all energy to the prosecution of general business, attending to collections and seeking money accommodations: purchase goods for trade in a conservative way and deal with judges, lawyers, and persons connected with religious organizations.

17—Thursday. Make no engagement towards wedlock nor expect much success in the elegant pursuits or from dealings in dry goods or fancy or ornamental wares. REGULUS especially advises the fair not to let wealth tempt them to wed in these passing days, especially where there is much disparity of years or if born about the middle days of January, April, July, or October, of past years.

18—Friday. Have caution in all the business.

past years.

18—Friday. Have caution in all thy business engagements on this day: sign no papers of consequence, travel not, nor engage any help: annoyances of considerable magnitude are likely just now to come to editors, authors, booksellers, publishers, printers, mathematicians, civil engineers, surveyors, lawyers and judges, especially if born about the 15th of January, 28th of May, 18th of July, or 29th of November of past years. To such persons correspondence goes wrong, gives little ultimate satisfaction, and if very important, is best postponed until a more fitting season.

19—Saturday. A day of no special promise: caution is invited for the day generally that no quarrel or unpleasantness come through excitement of mind or heat of debate.

20—Sunday. An evil Sabbath day, in which crosses and unpleasantness are likely in clerical affairs. Males born during the middle days of January, April, July, or October, of past years, should see to it in these passing weeks that business ruptures and changes do not come from acts of theirs and should not at this time begin important undertakings, but be satisfied with their present to trather than seek now to improve it by new ventures. Ladies, so born, are likely to be now in the midst of unpleasant experiences; misfortune or sorrows through their husbands, fathers, brothers, or lovers, and will need to be unusually circumspect in all their acts.

21—Monday. Give preference to the latter part of 21-Monday. Give preference to the latter part of this day for thy major transactions of consequence, especially for all manner of purchases in trade and money dealings.

Carried by Storm.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY E. BURKE COLLINS.

Copyright, 1902, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

HE stood among the roses, dainty, slim and pansy-eyed, with sun-kissed hair, but upon her small, perfect face the most insufferable pride and hauteur. The only child of a purse proud millionaire. the desire and sole ambition of her heart was for gold and jewels and rich attire.

Her robe of rich crimson silk trailed after her over the marble floor, and the exquisite lace which festooned it was caught with jewels, blazing diamonds and rubies, a shining, costly heap.

From the further end of the veranda a man was watching her, a handsome young man, with a dark, picturesque face. In his hand were some sheets of manuscript, but his eyes were fixed upon her as though he could not bear to look at any other but that one perfect and peerless picture.

"Are you ready, Lenore?" called her father.

"Quite ready, father," she answered, and the young man hastened to assist her into the carriage, at her father's side.

"Edgar," said the millionaire, when the girl had been carefully seated at his side, and the silken wrap placed around her shoulders; "you will answer letters tonight, and then there are some telegrams to await. My agent at my office will report to you by telephone."

"Yes, sir."
"There are important matters to look after, and possibly a final decision in the case of which I was speaking yesterday."
"Yes, sir."

"I refer to the case of that claim against me

"Yes, str."
"I refer to the case of that claim against me; that claim of the East Side property. Edgar, you must watch that decision, and bring me word as soon as possible. I must confess I am troubled in regard to it; for upon the decision depends much."
"You do not really think those people have any claim, papa?" asked his daughter. Judge Pardee elevated his eyebrows.
"Not a shadow, dear—unless—well, it will consume too much time now to explain; so never mind. No doubt it would interest you to hear about it, but of course, I spare you any annoyance. We shall not be late, Edgar," he resumed, "and if any serious news should arrive, come to me immediately."
"Very well, sir."
And then they drove away and Edgar Delmaine was alone. He stood watching the carrive proved field they stooned and side of the stood watching the carriers over of sight they stooned and side of the stood watching the carriers over of sight they stooned and side of the stood watching the carriers over of sight they stooned and side of the stood watching the carriers over of sight they stooned and sight sight and sight sight sight sight and sight si

And then they drove away and Edgar Delmaine was alone. He stood watching the carriage out of sight, then stooped and picked up a magnificent American Beauty rose which Lenore had dropped, and pressed it to his lips. "How beautiful she was tonight!" he murmured. "Oh, well, I must not think of her!" He slipped the rose into his breast and went to work with a will, with such a result that by dark the work was done.

Judge Pardee and his daughter had gone to a lawn party at the home of one of their aristocratic friends, and Edgar knew that the old gentleman awaited some more than usual intelligence that night from some business deals which comprehend half his fortune.

Only the day before had been Lenore's eighligence that night from some business deals which comprehend half his fortune.

Only the day before had been Lenore's eighteenth birthday, and upon that day Alden Reeves, the multi-millionaire, had placed his betrothal ring upon her white finger. She was his promised wife, and even if there were not the gulf of poverty between her and Edgar Delmaine, her father's secretary, she belonged to another. And at best no one would have expected her to look at him. So it was madness to waste time upon Lenore Pardee; she was as unattainable and far away as a star.

Alden Reeves was a gold-worshipper of the most sensuous type. He lived, moved and had his being all for the sake of gold. No other object touched his existence, and even though he loved with all his strength, that love would be base and sordid. No innocent motive or noble impulse ever dominated Alden Reeves' nature; he desired only shining gold. Even the beautiful girl who had promised to be his wife was a secondary consideration.

The secretary was thinking now of the man who had wooed and won lovely Lenore, and his heart was very bitter. Surely, he had more than his just rights. Wealth immeasurable, high position; but that comes in the wake of gold; and more than all else, he had Lenore. But her love! Edgar felt his lip curl with fine scorn, for well he knew that in the problem of life, love mattered nothing—nothing in the es-

A curious light flashed into Edgar Delmaine's dark eyes. It was as though he had just remembered. Ah! he had a secret of his own. Only a week ago great news had come to the secretary; news which had made a change in his affairs, but he was wiser not to make that secret public, yet.

He seated himself in a big armchair in the library, and awaited the first summons to the telephone. It came. Bad news for Judge Par-dee. The law-suit had been decided against him. There had been an appeal to a higher court; the decision was final. Edgar looked Another ring at the telephone; Edgar hastened to investigate. A ship belonging to Judge Pardee, on its homeward way, had been wrecked at sea and all on board lost.

Mecked at sea and all on board lost.

Again, a ring at the telephone. A certain mine was flooded and several miners killed and great loss sustained. And while Edgar sat there, once more came the fatal register and death and loss were multiplied. Somehow, the episode reminded Edgar of the many calamities that befell Job.

And trouble and calamity came in such approximate and the force of the blow was as numbers, and the force of the blow was so great, that the young man learned that which he had never expected to learn on earth,—how a man's life can be crushed out into utter dark—the lawn party was in progress, and there Medical and scientific authorities agree that the spread of an infectious disease is more requently caused by the carrying of the disease germs from one person to another by insects than in any other way. The examinations by the medical board appointed by the U. S. Surgeon General to investigate infectious diseases, etc., points conclusively to the mosquito as being responsible for the spread of yellow fever, malaria and other dangerous diseases. Disease is spread by an insect biting a person who is in an undangerous diseases. Disease is spread by an insect biting a person who is in an inhealthy condition and then carrying the poison to another person who may be in the best of health, but is quickly in the throes of disease brought on by the inoculation of poisonous matter into the blood by the bite of the insect. Keep a bottle of "5-DROPS" with you, ready for use at all times. "5-DROPS" applied to the bite will destroy disease germs and kill the poison. A leading authority in the medical profession writes:—"The sting or bite of a mosquito can be compared to a Hypodermic Syringe, loaded with the most virulent poison." Another authority says:—"Statistics prove that a mosquito-ridden neighbor-backling for residence and that in localities infested with these poison.' Another authority says:—"Statistics prove that a inosquito-range and all bood is a most dangerous locality for residence and that in localities infested with these disease-carrying insects the death rate is exceedingly high."

An application of "5-DROPS" to the bite of insects will at once kill the poison that has been injected and quickly relieve the irritation and soreness.

The tests last year in the south, in Cuba and in other parts of the world prove beyond question that the mosquito is the most dangerous of all insects, carrying and spreading disease wherever it goes

J. R. Kean, Surgeon U. S. V., writes: "The role of the mosquito in the transmission of certain diseases is now well established. The evidence is now perfect and conclusive that malaria, as well as filarial infections are carried by this insect."

As an illustration of the terrible effects of mosquito bites we refer to the city of Winchester, Va. where these deadly insects caused so much trouble that in the Spring of 1901 the City Council of Winchester, Va. passed an ordinance compelling every occupier of a house in that city to use the most strenuous efforts to rid the locality of these insects.

secretary held his own with good grace.
"I have heard some rumors regarding Judge Pardee's affairs," went on the rich man; "is there any truth in the unfortunate stories?" Edgar's face grew white.
"Unfortunate, indeed; but I prefer to say as little as possible. I am going now to see the Judge."

"You corroborate the report?" persisted Reeves; "I am—was—to be his son-in-law, and I have a right to know." "There is nothing to hope for," returned dgar impatiently. "I have to go to Judge of anger. Reeves straightened up threatening-ly, but thought better of it. "There may be a chance for you," he sneered. But his insolence was cut short, for Edgar Del-maine's right arm shot out from the shoulder, and Mr. Alden Reeves measured his length on the rich carpet. "I will meet you whenever and wherever you like," said Edgar, coolly.

But the other staggered to his feet without a word, and white and crestfallen hastened from ness suddenly, by worldly calamities. In one night, at one fell blow, Judge Pardee's ruin was wrought, and in that one night he became a poor man.

Somehow, Edgar gained courage to help him through the ordeal, for to him the ordeal was almost as bitter as though it were his own individual sorrow, blow for blow. And how world the world when the ordeal was offered to be a summer of the world world she bear it? She, who lived for the world has terrible tidings to the old man. Judge Pardee uttered no cry nor moan; his cheek grew deathly white, but he said no word. He summoned his daughter, and with as much calmness as though nothing serious had happened, placed her in the carriage, got in at her side, and together with Edgar they drove homeward. Alas! they had no home in the world now!

alone? He shuddered, and then his eyes lit up with a smile. But, no! he would keep his secret yet.

There was a ring at the doorbell, and a servant ushered in Alden Reeves! The secretary arose, and his face was very pale and stern, as he acknowledged Reeves' cool, insolent greeting.

"You are Judge Pardee's private secretary?" he queried. Edgar bowed quite as haughtily as Mr. Reeves himself, and truth to tell, the secretary held his own with good grace.

"I have heard some rumors regarding Judge Pardee's private secretary Judge Pardee's private secretary held his own with good grace.

"Their eves wet and they had no home in the world now!

In the grand entrance hall at the old Pardee mansion, Edgar paused and glanced swiftly into Lenore's beautiful, proud face. She was pale broken the news to her. The young man's eyes met the full, startled gaze of the girl, and with a swift movement his hand closed softly, firm ly around her white fingers. She withdrew her hand as though his touch had profaned it, and with a haughty gesture, stepped aside.

"Lenore!"

Their eves wet and they had no home in the world now!

In the grand entrance hall at the old Pardee mansion, Edgar paused and glanced swiftly into Lenore's beautiful, proud face. She was pale with premonition, but her father had not yet broken the news to her. The young man's eyes met the full, startled gaze of the girl, and with a swift movement his hand closed softly, firm ly around her white fingers. She with a with part had now!

"Lenore!"
Their eyes met, and a swift thrill of something which she did not understand, flashed through her veins. Her father had stepped into the library; somehow Edgar's dark eyes seemed to thrill the girl through and through. With a low cry he caught her in his arms. Yes; the haughty, exclusive millionaire's daughter was in the arms of the poor secretary. in the arms of the poor secretary!

in the arms of the poor secretary!

"My darling! my darling!" he cried. "I have loved you always."

The library door, opening just then, aroused him from his trance of rapture; rapture, for she had not repulsed him. And he saw before him, Judge Pardee, white to the lips, and shaking feebly, like one half estranged. But still, his proud old face was convulsed with a storm of ungovernable rage and wounded pride.

At that moment Alden Reeves strode in at the library door, pale and passion-tossed. He the library door, pale and passion-tossed. He had gone, to verify without the possibility of a doubt, the secretary's story of loss and beggary, and now had returned to the old man, to cut the Gordian knot that bound him where there was no longer gold.

In a few broken words he stammered out the story of his regret over the betrothal; and Judge Pardee knew that his peerless daughter was thrown aside like a faded flower or a worn-out glove; and there in the presence of the secretary (oh! bitter shame and humiliation), secretary (oh! bitter shame and humiliation), Judge Pardee listened to the shameful words that told him that, his daughter's gold gone, the man who had asked her to be his wife was giving her up forever.

He listened and lived through it all, through all the shame of the bitter blow. And did no voice whisper to his heart of the mockery of a marriage built only upon a foundation of gold and false sentiment? Edgar Delmaine came forward, and his white face confronted the old man, as Alden Reeves slunk away.

But, trembling and panting, he motioned the secretary out of his path. His wrinkled face wore a look of unyielding and undying pride.

"How dare you?" he choked huskily. "You have dared to take unpardonable liberties,—you, the poverty-stricken secretary—such unparalleled boldness because—"

"I—I—do not know your meaning," gaspeu and faltered the old man. Then, turning, he pointed to the door. "Go!" he faltered. But Edgar stood gazing into Lenore's eyes, glorious eyes! "You do love me, Lenore!" he questioned softly. Her face was turned to his; she bowed her haughty head—proud—but she had found her master! had found her master!

"Go!" commanded the old man cruelly once more. "She is mad—you shall not insult herbecause—because she is poor."

"She shall not be poor, nor you," returned the young man quietly. "I may as well keep my secret no longer. Your wealth is gone, it is true. But my grandfather, who died a few weeks ago, has left me heir to millions. It is all my own. We love each other—Lenore and I—and I have found it out; I have carried her heart by storm. The Chief of the U.S. Weather Bureau has invented a machine that will cool a room to a temperature of sixty degrees, but so far he has not been able to invent a Weather Bureau that the people can get any kind of weather out of that they may need at the time, and that is what this country wants.

Postmaster General Payne is urging Congress to pass a bill providing a postal currency whereby small amounts of money may be sent by mail, and it is hoped that such a law will be passed. All over this great country of ours people have occasion to send money through the postoffice in amounts too small for checks, even if the persons had bank accounts, which most of them do not, and thousands of dollars are lost every month, either by being missent or failing to be delivered, or the money is stolen. This is a hardship to many who can ill afford to lose money, and so far there has been no remedy for it. Money orders and postal notes are expensive or cannot be had at all offices, and the people have been compelled to send money in bills or coins, which can be detected in the envelopes and thus afford the dishonest ones an opportunity to use it themselves. A safe and convenient postal currency is needed by millions of people and the Postmaster General's recommendation and request for it should be responded to promptly.

The prospect just at present for a great national highway between New York and Chicago, a distance of nearly one thousand miles, is very good indeed, and President John B. Uhle of the N. Y. C. and C. Road Association says that he believes the road will be completed within three or four years. This great road should be the start for one to extend from the Atlantic to the Pacific with branches in all directions so that all parts of our country may be accessible. Nothing is more indicative of the thrift of a people than good roads, and nothing is of greater convenience at all seasons. The wretched dirt roads that prevail in so many states are a disgrace to the enterprise of the country and a constant source of annoyance and loss to those who use them. It should be that every community had that kind of spirit which would first of all make good roads to get they are not housed so well as many cattle are. around on, and then have the other things that | Their houses are owned by landlords who care good roads lead to. The church, the school nothing for the health or comfort of their tenhous; the neighbor's home, the store and postoffice should all be easily accessible in bad weather as well as good, and every man, woman In these nasty, ill-smelling, poorly ventilated, and child ought to do all they can to secure roads that can be traveled comfortably at all seasons. No section can develop and be worth anything if its roads are bad.

The country generally and the individual particularly have been seriously disturbed by strikes within the past two months, and strikes are bad for all concerned. Nobody questions the right of labor to demand its own, for the Bible says the laborer is worthy of his hire, but demanding it is one thing and getting it is another, and to get it is the main thing. It has been pretty conclusively shown that the ordinary strike is not the way to get it. man earning a dollar a day counts just as much as the vote of a Vanderbilt or a Rockfeller with his hundreds of millions. As there are hundreds of laboring men to every rich man in the country, the result of a Labor Voting Union can be seen at once. Nowhere in the world have the laboring men the advantages that they have in this country, and they can have still more if they stand together for the maintenance of the laws and vote for the men and the principles that they feel are the best for them. It is to vote and not to strike, wherein their best interest lies.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie, the Library Lover, has given fifty thousand dollars more to the establishment of another library, and he has yet other millions to add to those he has already given to the cause of the mind, when the cause of the body is suffering for the very help he could give it. There is no urgent demand for Carnegie libraries in this country where books and magazines and newspapers are to be had everywhere at prices to suit all purses, and in thousands of places to be had free, but there is a demand for better houses for working people to live in. Every city in this country has its so-called "tenement quarter," where human beings are housed like so many cattle. Indeed, per cent. out of their investment as they can. dark, dismal homes men, women and children are huddled together, with nothing to attract, and the result is that as soon as the work of the day is done the men go to the saloons, the women go to bed to rest, and the boys and girls go out on the streets to meet any and all kinds of associates and to be taught any and all kinds of crime. The fact that a great many of them do not become criminals is sufficient evidence that they have the right principles in them, and it is for the development of this kernel of good that the money of Mr. Carnegie and other rich men should be expended in building homes for working people, where the rent will be low and where the highest sanitary regulations would be applied. With bright, clean,

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

F the season happens to be a dry one, it will be necessary to water the flowers if we expect them to do well. This should be done at night,—or anyway, after sundown—that the plants may get all possible benefit from the applica-tion. If water is ap-plied while the sun is shining, evapo-ration will take is shining, evaporation will take place so rapidly because of the heat, that most of the moisture is given off from the soil before the roots of the plants are reached by it. But if it is applied after the sun has gone down, the soil has an opportunity to take it all in, and as there will be precipitation of moisture then, rather than evaporation, the plants will receive the benefit aimed at. In watering plants, do not sprinkle the soil all about them, but take the nozzle off the watering pot and apply the water directly from the spout to the base of each plant.

If a screen, or a division-fence between one part of the garden and another is desired, a very effective one can be easily made by stretching woven-wire netting on posts, the height of which corresponds with the width of netting used. Train over this netting—which should have a rather coarse mesh,—any kind of vine that suits you, and in a short time you will have a mass of foliage and flowers that will answer all the purposes of a fence of a purely ornamental character. A permanent fence of this kind can be covered with our native Ampelopsis, which can be found growing along streams, and in swampy places, in nearly all parts of the country. This vine is easily transplanted. It grows rapidly, and is always beautiful, but especially so in fall, when its foliage changes from green to crimson and maroon.

If you are growing Chrysanthemums for fall flowering,—and few women, nowadays, are without at least half a dozen varieties of this very popular flower,—they should be given careful attention at this season of the year. Do very popular flower,—they should be given careful attention at this season of the year. Do not allow them to grow to suit themselves. If you do, the chances are that when fall comes you will have a lot of scraggly plants. Keep watch of them as they are developing and train them into proper shape by pinching off the ends of the branches that are inclined to lengthen at the expense of others. If this is done, side branches will be formed, and thus you get a plant that is bushy and compact and symmetrical in shape.

If the black aphis attacks your Chrysanthemums, procure some tobacco—the stronger the better,—and steep it in hot water until its strength is fully extracted. Then apply this to the infested plants in the form of a spray, taking particular pains to see that it reaches every part of the plant. This is important, as, if a few aphides escape, they will multiply so rapidly that before you are aware of it your plants will be covered with their progeny.

Keep the ground in which your plants are growing well stirred by the frequent use of the hoe. Don't think, if the season is a dry one, that a hoe ought not to be used. Loose, open soils absorb all the moisture that comes along, while dry, hard, crusted soils are unfavorable to absorption. An ordinary dew, or a light while dry, hard, crusted soils are unfavorable shower, cannot penetrate the crust, hence your plants receive no benefit from them. An open paants receive no beneat from them. An open soil acts like a sponge, and takes in whatever moisture it comes in contact with. To grow Dahlias well, you must keep their roots always moist. Save all the water of wash-water from the pump. The washwater is better, however, because it contains a certain amount of nutriment which the Dablis can better, however, because it contains a certain amount of nutriment which the Dahiia can make excellent use of.

After the Petunias have perceted their first crop of flowers, go over the bed and cut the old branches back at least two thirds their length. In a short time new branches will start, and these will, after a little, produce flowers. By going over the beds in this way several times during the season and feeding the plants well, you may have as good flowers all through the summer and fall as those which the plants gave at their first crop. But if this is not done, the plants take on an exhausted look, and their flowers are few and inferior, after July. One of the secrets of successful floriculture is the renewing of a plant after it has passed it prime. If you can do this, you can keep your plants healthy throughout the season, and if you prevent them from forming seed they will blossom as freely in September as they did in July. That is—most plants grown in the ordinary garden. Some plants cannot be coared to do this. They will produce one crop of flowers, and only one.

The Gladiolus ought to be in every garden. It is to the garden what the Geranium is to the window. Anybody can grow it. Give it a soil of moderate richness, made light and mellow, plant it four inches below the surface, and keep the weeds down about it, during the season, and—it will do the rest! There will be from two to four flower-stalks from each strong root, and these will bear from ten to twenty flowers each, of the richest and most brilling colors imaginable. The colors range from white and palest yellow to red, crimson, often with combinations of several distinct colors in the same flower. The new Groff hybrids are simply magnificent in form, size, and beauty of color. They are wonderful improvements over the old Gladiolus. No garden is complete without a few of them.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"What will kill the green lice which infest my house plants?" Mrs. S. D. G.—Shave a quarter of a pound of the Ivory soap you use in the kitchea into fine pieces, and cover it with a little water, and let it stand on the stove until melted. They add to it a pailful of water. Dip the infested plans in it, shaking them about well when under water. This is a safe insecticide. It will not harm the most delicate plant, but it will kill every aphin with which it comes in contact.

with which it comes in contact.

"I have some Geraniums growing in the garden. Can I make use of them in the house in winter Some tell me they will not bloom well." Miss A.A. H.—If you allow them to bloom freely in the gaten, in summer, you cannot expect much from them during winter. No plant can keep on flowering the year round. It must have a resting-spell your Geraniums will take theirs at a time when you want them to furnish flowers, if you use the old plants for this purpose. The only way to make set of plants expressly for winter use. These should not be allowed to bloom during the summer.

"What will keep moles away from the gardens"
S.S.J.—Scatter seeds of the Castor Plant about the place troubled with these animals. Next year grow some Castor Plants. They are extremely elyfective as ornaments of the garden because of their dark, rich foliage, of immense size, and the fact that they are obnoxious to the mole makes them doubly desirable.

dark, rich foliage, of immense size, and the fact that they are obnoxious to the mole makes that doubly desirable.

"I never have any luck with basket-plants. The always turn yellow and die. Why?" Mrs.L.—Probably because you do not use water enoughs them. You will readily see, if you give the matter a little thought, that plants in baskets require a good deal more water than plants in pots because they are suspended in a warmer stratum of atmosphere where evaporation is more rapid than on the window-sill below. They are also exposed to the air on all sides, and, as a general thing, they are air oversels which are not well calculated to retain moisture. There is no trouble in growing plants well in baskets if you are careful to give them all the water they need. It is a good plan to have them suspended by a cord long enough to allow you to drop them into a pail of water, where they should be left until they have become completely saturated. In hot summer weather it may be necessary to do this once a day. Another good planis to take a tin can and make a small hole in the bottom of it. Fill this with water, and set it in the basket. Watch results. If the water escapes as rapidly as it ought to, the soil will be kept most if the soil dries out about the edge of the basket, you may be sure that the hole in the can. If the soil dries out about the edge of the basket, you may be sure that the hole in the can is not large it a little and take more observations. It is an easy matter to adjust the size of the hole to the amount of water required. If this plan is foilowed there is no more attention demanded by a plant in a basket than one growing in a pot. Simply fill your can and put it in place, and lears it until it needs refilling. The foliage of the view can be arranged about it in such a manner as to almost if not quite hide it, therefore it need not wunsightly.

Mrs. J. C. Hale.—Roses are propagated by cuttings, by divisions of the roots, and by lavering. Cuttings should be of half-ripened wood. Let them be about three or four incheslong. Insert them in coarse sand, in shallow boxes or trenches, and make the sand quite firm about their base. Keep moist at all times. Layering,—which is a surer method for the amateur—consists in bending down a branch, preferably one near the base of the plant, and inserting a portion of it in the soil, learing the end in an upright position. At the place where the branch comes in contact with the soil, make a cut from below, about half way through the branch in a slanting manner. This somewhat obstructs the flow of sap and a calous forms, from which roots will, in due time, be sent out. After the branch begins to grow well—but not beforesever that portion of it connected with the parent plant. Roses which send up sprouts freely can be divided in such a manner that each sprout can be taken away with a few roots attached. This is the safest of all methods for increasing stock of choice varieties. But nowadays Roses are so cheap that it does not pay one to depend on cuttings or layer ing.

Mrs. H.—If fresh lime is used, worms can be driven from the soil of pot-plants by its persistent use. Air-slaked lime is worthless. # THE HOME WORKERS OF COMFORT.

Louis Kellogg, the singer, who, when a young lady was very much annoyed by the thin appearance of her arms when she was obliged to wear evening gowns at the reconcerts. She tried the use of the broom, and soon had round, plump arms as the reward of her exercise. This experiment of the muscles of the arms and the accomplishment of the weekly sweeping, which would probably be appreciated by our correspondent's mother. Breathing exercises are, of course, a sure help for a caved-in chest. At night rub the chest with a mixture of cocoa butter, one part, with two parts of lanolin. Every morning dip a sponge into cold water and dash it over the neck and chest, afterward rubbing thoroughly dry with a heavy towel.

Anna and Lula Green of Keokuk write asking for suggestions for entertainments suitable to be given by the young people's society of their church. We have heard of one which seems to us unique and from which a good deal of fun can be gotten, and we trust it will strike our young friends in the same way.

Get all your pretty and talented girls to dress in their prettiest gowns, and over the gown to wear some comical, old-maid get-up, any old forlorn rig they can contrive. Let them wear expressions to fit their outer garments, and all appear on the stage, as though gathered for an entertainment which is to be given by one of your men gotten up as a Proffessor of the black arts. At one end of the stage have a large wardrobe, or corner partitioned off with curtains, large enough for a person to go in and make a slight change in her attire. Then have the Professor ask the ladies if they care to change their estate and appearance, and if so, will they please step into the closet; before going in he will give each a drink of something which he will call the elixir of life and which will renew their youth. One by one the poor old things come forward, go into the box and then come out, all in their pretty, fresh, up-to-date gowns and with youthful and smilling faces. Of course the outer garments are arranged in such a

Then decorate the neck in any way desired, making its quare as shown in the illustration, or making a round neck, in which case a full ruffle case a full ruffle of hamburg is the prettiest finish. Probably most of our older readers did "spatter work" when they were children. This decorative feature has been revived, like the tatting and crochet patterns just now in great vogue, and for the benefit of the younger readers we give directions for doing this work artistically, also suggest some articles of furniture to be used for this decoration.

Spatter work is a trick rather than an art. First buy a common stiff nail brush and two or three stiff tooth brushes. Get a fine piece of sieve and a few fine and coarse pens. Buy five cents worth of burnt umber in the powder and a quart of malt vinegar. Take some pieces of new board for practice pieces. Then gather some lovely ferns, a large quantity of them, and put them carefully into heavy books to press. From old magazines cut out designs of birds and flowers; also gather small flowers and press very carefully. Have all your materials at hand, lay your design face down on the wood, then arrange ferns and leaves and fasten very firmly with pins; have the design close. Then mix a large design carefully, one spray at a time, and the result will be a perfect outline of all the ferns and leaves which will, of course, be white, or whatever color the board was, while all around the edges will be fine spatters of black. When perfectly dry, varnish with white varnish, using a brush such as painters use for putting on varnish. The pens are used for putting eyes into the animals and birds, etc., and making heavy stems to flowers and ferns where desired. Now if you have an old table, that is, one which is good shape and strong but which is scarred and needs painting,—paint in white and when perfectly dry put on a fine design in spatter work. Use old furniture for this purpose, also a painted wall, which will be found to take the spatter work beautifully, and many quaint designs can be worked in this way. For a nursery, for instance, put a series of Red Riding Hood pictures, which you have cut out of an old picture book. New ideas will come to you which will be original and pretty and this work is fascinating and inexpensive and therefore very desirable.

CHAPTER VI.

OSE left Major Cleveland in great excitement of manner, but with all her wits strung to their utmost tension. Her mind was usually clear, sharp and decisive. Some bold and desperate step was necessary as matters now stood, and with compressed lips she resolved to take it, whatever it might be. Plan after plan, suggestion upon suggestion, floated through her mind—presented themselves, were examined, dismissed, and she still remained undecided as to her course.

To marry Walter Armstrong that night was her determination; and she was only at loss, therefore, at the means to accomplish such an Scarcely were these words uttered, ere Captain Arbald came smiling and begging her

The dance commenced, and in the midst of shoulder, as the major with an acquiescing nod turned and walked away.

As he did so, Rose saw him stop suddenly and stare upon the person of her maid—a young but superior Irish girl, who stood half way up the hall, but quite visible to Rose from the position in which she chanced to be. The major, after looking at the young girl for a moment or two, turned and walked towards the hall door. As he did so, the light that poured from the drawing-room door into the hall, fell upon his features, and in the instant in which Rose could observe his face, she saw that it was lighted up with some new thought over which he appeared to be chuckling with delight.

"He is laying his train," thought Rose; "what can it be?"
She looked from him to the maid, instinctively feeling that she had something to do she looked from him to the maid, instinctively feeling that she had something to do with the major's visibly expressed pleasure, when suddenly a suspicion of the truth flashed upon her mind.

The instant the dance was over, Arbald made an excuse for leaving her, and she saw him hasten away in the direction the major had gone.

gone.

Her own course was resolved upon without further hesitation. Hastening up to Metcalf, she whispered—
"Arbald and he are together. Watch!" And

"Arbaid and he are together. Watch!" And then commanding Bridget, her maid, to follow, she ran up quickly to her own apartment. "Change dresses with me," was her brief and emphatic command. The girl looked astounded and began to exclaim, but Rose imperatively commanded her to silence, and reseated the order.

peratively commanded her to silence, and repeated the order.

The change was soon effected and Rose directed her maid to proceed to the drawing-room, to throw open the door which communicated with the hall and to stand by the window, as if looking out upon the moonlight. In this position her back only would be seen, and the guests seeing her there apparently in a reverie, would generally respect her privacy. But if any did approach, Rose's directions continued, she was to step off upon the piazza, as if unwilling to be observed, and if followed then there were abundant ways of escaping determined.

tinued, she was to step off upon the piazza, as if unwilling to be observed, and if followed then there were abundant ways of escaping detection once in the garden walks. Bridget was a shrewd, smart girl, and Rose felt every confidence in her ability to carry out the deceit.

Meanwhile, Metcalf followed Arbald and the major, who, walking down the garden, both halted by a bush, behind which Metcalf crawled up and listened.

Major Cleveland explained to Arbald, in a few words, how matters stood.

"Now," said he, "I have an idea which, if carried out, puts Armstrong in our hands and opens your way to the hand of Miss Elsworth. I am sure that Rose will attempt by some means to consummate a marriage with that rebel before tomorrow morning. She is shrewd, cunning beyond belief, and unless we play a desperate game, it will assuredly be done. Now she has a maid in attendance upon her who is near her size and figure. My plan is to bribe this girl to represent her mistress, disguised as her to be introduced into the presence of Armstrong. and there married to him—he to be introduced into the presence of Armstrong, and there married to him—he thinking it Rose, and knowing her character, ready to suspect some plan in it to effect his escape. Do you see?"

"The girl will never consent."

"We'll tell her it's a jest—a sham marriage for the amusement of the thing—or else, which would be true, show her that she will be a widow before tomorrow night, with a good fifty pounds in her pocket, and free to marry again if she pleases. Send her to me and I'll manage it never fear. Luckily we have the manage it, never fear. Luckily we have the chaplain with us. Go hunt up the girl, but don't be seen talking with her."

Arbald went to obey his superior's command, and Metcalf crawled off and made for Rose's presence as rapidly as possible.

Ascending to her room, he knocked at her door. She admitted him, and listened to his communication without surprise. It was all just as she had divined.

Rose descended by a back way to the lower floor, and slipped out of the house unobserved. It was not difficult to manage it so that Arbald should see her, and she allowed herself to be

As it was, the shadow of a tree in which they stood, effectually concealed her features, and her voice she knew how to manage too well to fear disclosure in that way.

"You look like a lively, quick-witted lass," said the major.

"Oh, so all 'our' admirers say." "Do you know how to keep a silent tongue?"

"Bless us! Haven't we always been in practice? Ain't 'we' mum as to what all the gentlemen say to 'us?' about the bouquets, the presents, the love-notes—"
"Yes, yes. But how would you like to earn fifty pounds?"
"Good gracious! fifty pounds? How can you ask?"

"Fifty pounds if you will marry-in jest, mind-a man whom I will name to you."

"Dear me! Captain Armstrong! Well?"
"A pretended chaplain will be by, and a sham form of marriage will be gone through with. Do you understand?"
"Yes, yes."
"You must not speak above the lowest whisper, nor let the captain see your features. The moment it is done, fifty pounds are yours."
"But, I don't understand—"
"Oh, you understand quite enough for your part of the performance."

"Oh, lor,' you startle me so."

"A hundred pounds, remember."

"I—I, really sir——"

"You've gone too far, girl, to retreat. You must marry him, knowing my plans as you do, or be sent down to New York a prisoner yourself. If the captain does not die, you can obtain a divorce—I will assist you to it."

"I'll do it, sir. It's hard, but I know if I should be sent down to them prison ships I should die—I should. But, don't tell anybody—please don't."

should die—I should. But, don't tell anybody—please don't."

"The secret will be safe. Here is a ring for the ceremony. Remember now—caution. Keep your veil over your face. It will be over with in a moment."

They had arrived at the barn. The guard stood back and saluted them. Cleveland gave his companion a warning pressure of the hand, and Rose was ushered into the presence of her lover.

The place was dimly lighted by a single lantern. Walter and an officer in dark uniform stood by a bench on which the lantern rested. As Walter saw Rose enter, he gave a look of surprise and started toward her. Rose seized his arm, and whispered quickly is arm, and whispered quickly—
"Be governed by me—a scheme—a marriage to save you.'

Looking back, Rose saw a figure watching her, which she knew to be that of Major Cleveland. The guard stood also looking in. This she was glad of, as a witness was necessary. Taking Walter's arm, she led him up before the chaplain—who, simply informed that he was to marry the prisoner to a woman who would present herself, and to mention the circumstances to no one, began the ceremony at once. Walter was confused and astonished, but a pressure upon his arm from the hand of Rose, controlled the expression of his astonishment, and he quietly, but with a vague wonder, performed his part in the ceremony.

It was over, the chaplain closed his book. Rose drew her veil closely around her face and passed hurriedly out, trembling now that the thing was over, and amazed at the temerity of real, no-mistake marriage—"

"But it isn't. Come, do you consent? 'Tis only a jest. You will see that for yourself."
"Will Captain Armstrong think it a jest?"
"Oh, I'll manage that. He thinks there is a plan on foot to introduce your mistress to him for a similar nurrose, and so I've planned for a similar nurrose.

plan on foot to introduce your mistress to him for a similar purpose, and so I've planned this trick. What say you?"
"Fifty pounds, sir—all in gold, mind you—is more than 'we' can resist. I'll slip on one of my mistress' dresses at once."
"Do so. Meet me here the moment you are ready—in half an hour, say?"
In less time than that mentioned by the major, Rose was upon the spot designated. She wore a heavy veil that shrouded her head and face, and her dress now was, of course, one of her own. In a few moments the major came up.

"I'll act her to the life, sir, you may be sure of that."

"I am sure of it. You're a smart girl. Are you ready?

"I am, sir. Please to tell me, major, now, what really is to become of the young captain!" said Rose, as they walked off together.
"Do you like the captain?" inquired Cleveland, in response to her query.

the step she had taken. She had not passed ten steps from the door before Major Cleveland stepped up to her side from out the shadow of a shrub into which he had withdrawn. wickedness. It's remorse that's in me, mister major."
"Tut, tut," replied the major; "here's the sum I promised you. You're richer, my girl, than ever you were before, I'll be sworn, and have done more good than harm at that."
He slipped into her hand a roll of notes, and then turning upon his heel would have walked away, had not Rose seized him by the arm with well acted fear.
"Don't leave me, don't leave me, ver honor.

It's guilty I feel with this gown on, and if any of the young officers should speak to me, the murder would out."

"That's true. I will walk with you to the entrance. Keep your veil close."

"Never fear, mister major. It's ashamed I'll be to look at my own face from this hour forth. I tremble all over with the guilt. Do, yer honor, let me support myself a bit on yer arm."

Rose took her companion's arm. The major yielded it awkwardly, and with an inward imprecation upon the impudence of the sup-posed Bridget. Rose continued talking, with-posed Bridget. Rose continued talking, without noticing the manner of the major.

"Ah, sir, I shall never dare look in Miss Rose's eyes again. What will she say to me, to be sure? It will be a dumb and shame-faced moment for me when she looks right through into my heart with those eyes of hers, and says, 'Bridget, what was it that ye did?' Pouring out a flood of lamentation, sorrow, and regret in the above style, she succeeded in guiding Cleveland around and up to the rear entrance of the building without his perceiving their course.

"Confound it, girl, where have you brought "Good gracious! You take my breath away!"

"Hush! Don't make such a chatter?"
"You know, sir, 'we' must faint upon such occasions."
"It would be mere form. The captain dies tomorrow— Captain Armstrong," resumed he, "will be sent down to New York tomorrow to be tried as a spy. He will hardly escape.
This marriage is necessary to secure an imporright, never doubt."

Without observing the awkward restraint with which the major yielded his arm, lose led him into the house, and quickly passing into the dining-room, they entered together. The room was lighted, for the guests had freely been passing in and out. The major rather roughly shook himself from his companion, and turned to leave the room, Rose glided before him, closing the door as she did so, and stood facing him with her back to the door. the door.

"What do you mean?" exclaimed he impatiently. "I mustn't be seen here with you. What do you mean, I say?"
Rose threw off her veil.
"It means, Major Cleveland," exclaimed she

The major started back with the most be-The major started back with the most bewildering and unconcealed amazement, as the clear ringing laugh of Rose Elsworth burst upon his astounded senses. Rose, with her lightning eye, her cheek glowing with a splendid carnation, stood looking at him, the impersonation of exultant triumph.

The major could not speak. He was a picture of rage, mortification and foaming fury.
"I'll thank you, sir," said she pointing to the wedding-ring upon her finger, "for an order for Captain Armstrong's release."

"Miss Elsworth!" at last exclaimed he, between his teeth.

"Miss Elsworth!" at last exclaimed he, between his teeth.

"Your pardon, sir. Mrs. Armstrong—by your kind assistance."

"By——!" The major choked down the oath, but he shook his fist in the air.

"Caught! tricked!"

"It was too bad, I know, Major Cleveland, to make you pay so dearly for your own discomfiture, but really, the trouble you gave me entitles me to the hundred pounds. Pil keep them, sir, as a memento of the occasion."

"The maid betrayed me, then.——I'll——

"Not at all, sir. You never spoke a word to Bridget. I was the only person you saw."

"He is innocent as a lamb. The guilt, sir, lies wholly on me. Shall I send for Arbaid that you may commission him to release Captain Armstrong?"

lies wholly on me. Shall I send for Arbald that you may commission him to release Captain Armstrong?"

"Madam, this is a farce!"

"Sir, I know it. But it has been played out, and you, unwittingly, have acted the clown."

"The end is not yet. I refuse to release Captain Armstrong. I refuse to be governed by a forced construction to a promise which I meant to apply differently. He is still my prisoner, madam, and your proceeding shall only hasten his condemnation and punishment. By heavens, I have a mind to go at once, and shoot him like a dog!"

"If your promise," said Rose, calmly, "is not observed to the letter, I'll proclaim you through the army. I'll degrade you in the eyes of every English officer and gentleman in the land. You disgrace your sword, sir, by this very hesitation. Your bitter, unsoldierly and dishonorable hatred and persecution of an honorable prisoner, drove me to an extremity which nothing but a question of life or death could have permitted me to undertake. My womanly modesty I was forced to outrage. You compelled me to stoop to things which I abhorred. But I have a brother who is an English officer; a husband who is an American one. Be careful, sir, in what way you use my name in connection with this night's work, for, be assured, they will not fail to punish a slanderer, or a libertine tongue. Release Captain Armstrong, and your treachery remains a secret. None need know it, for the marriage I shall require to be solemnized before consenting to bear his name. But refuse, and with one word I'll make a public confession."

Major Cleveland walked the floor during these remarks, gnawing his lips, and muttering flerce imprecations.

"Madam, I'll not abandon the field so easily."

"Madam, I'll not abandon the field so easily."

"You acknowledged the binding nature of your promise, when you attempted, with such heartless cruelty, to entrap the captain into a marriage with an Irish servant. How would that story sound, think you? And what would be said of the sagacity and discernment of an officer who could allow such a deceit to be practiced upon him as I practiced upon you? There is only one retreat—let the captain go."

The major ground his teeth together. He tried to think of a loop-hole through which he might escape. Nothing suggested itself. He was hemmed in on all sides. At last he stopped before her.

"Miss Elsworth!"

"Excuse me, sir, if I assist your memory.

"Miss Elsworth!"

"Excuse me, sir, if I assist your memory.

Mrs. Armstrong!"

"Mrs. Armstrong, then—"

He was interrupted by the quick, clear crack of a rifle. The major started, and turned his head to listen. It was followed immediately by a dozen rapid discharges and a faint, distant shout. He drew his sword, and throwing open the door, hurried into the hall. Rose darted from the room by another way, which ushered her into the drawing-room. Here all was terror and confusion. The officers, at the first alarm, had left their partners, and hastened without to learn the danger. Some of the ladies were screaming, all were pale, but the largest number remained calm and collected. They were used to such scenes.

Meanwhile, confusion and uncertainty prevailed without the largest member remained calm and collected. They were used to such scenes.

collected. They were used to such scenes.
Meanwhile, confusion and uncertainty prevailed without. The discharges still continued.
Major Cleveland took his stand upon the piazza, and rapidly gave his orders. Officers rushed hither and thither, and the troops, many of them aroused from slumber, began rapidly to assemble, and form upon the lawn. A sentine was brought up, badly wounded, who explained that he had been fired on from an ambuscade. A young officer, a moment afterwards, came up, and hurriedly informed the commandant that they were beset on all sides by a party whose number it was impossible to ascertain. The moon by this time was near its setting, and for the moment, obscured by a cloud. This of course confused and embarassed the moments of the levelists but they rassed the movements of the loyalists, but they were soon mounted, and, headed by Major Cleveland, dashed towards the scene of attack.

The ladies, huddled together, listened to the clamor with the courage which so distinguished the women of that period. Several of the troop had been detailed and left to protect them—for Major Cleveland would rather lose a battle than his reputation for gallantry.

Rose was pale and calm. If she secretly ex-perienced more fear and anxiety than the rest, it was because she had so much more at stake. She could not conceal from herself the likelihood that Major Cleveland might attempt to sever the gordian knot of his perplexity by the death of Walter—so easily accomplished in the midst of a melee like this, without a chance of (CONTINUED ON PAGE 6.)

Hot Weather Cookery.

HERE is very little pleasure in doing kitchen work in hot kitchen work in hot weather. At other times of the year the housekeeper does not object to the duties that keep her near the stove, but when the thermometer begins running up as though it were going to pop over the top of the tube she longs to get to a cooler corner.

One of the things besides the heat that

One of the things besides the heat that makes the kitchen work harder in summer is the feeling that people want something to tempt their appetites. In cool weather almost anything goes in the way of food so long as it is whole-some and well cooked. In the heated term it is different. The appetites of the men who do the out-door work may be good but the appetites of the women and children begin to fail. Very often the men, too, turn away from the abundant provisions and wish that they had something else for a change.

dant provisions and wish that they had something else for a change.

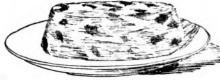

The great struggle is to find something that will taste good and be nourishing and give the variety that is craved without putting a great burden of extra work upon the housekeeper. She generally has a big load to carry in summer, when, if she lives on a farm, there is the care of the butter and milk and very often extra mouths to cook for. She is willing to do all she can, but sometimes it seems a little more than she can bear to be expected to do all the hard labor and provide fresh bills of fare at the same time.

There is no doubt that it is hard and the only way to lighten the care is by trying to find out

There is no doubt that it is hard and the only way to lighten the care is by trying to find out something that will save extra work and yet provide good results in the way of food. There are very few housekeepers who do not wish to make their table attractive. They feel a pride in it and unless they are very tired like to learn of new ways of doing things—especially when these new things can be done without too much extra care.

extra care.

One of the ways in which they can simplify their labor is by accustoming their families to a certain number of cold dishes. I do not mean by this that hot food is to be ruled out. By no means. In the first place all cold food is good for no one as a steady diet, and in the second place there are many persons who object to it and do not feel satisfied unless they have a certain amount of hot food placed before them three times or at least twice a day. One cannot expect to break them of the habit all at once, but with a little effort it is possible to offer them such attractive cold dishes that they will in time come to prefer them to an unchanging diet of hot food.

JELLIED CHICKEN.

Take meat, for instance. Plain cold meat.

will in time come to prefer them to an unchanging diet of hot food.

Take meat, for instance. Plain cold meat, while some persons like it very much, is not relished by many men and women. But with very little more trouble it is possible to make the cold meat into a savoury or attractive dish that nearly every one will find acceptable.

Look at beef. Cold boiled beef is not very good to the palate. Cold roast beef is better, but in these days of high prices for beef it is not always within the powers of housekeepers who have little money to spare to buy a good big piece of roasting beef in order to have a lot left over to eat when cold. With the little extra work that is involved in making beef a la mode,—a name that sounds more formidable than the thing is itself,—one may get a cheaper cut of beef and have a round that will be good hot and good cold and will tempt the appetite as long as there is a piece of it left. It may be cooked when other work is going on at the kitchen stove and if a large piece is prepared it will save cooking of fresh meat for a couple of days afterwards.

Look, too, at corned beef. The reason more days afterwards.

days afterwards.

Look, too, at corned beef. The reason more persons do not like this is because it is so carelessly prepared for the table. It often comes on in a ragged, untrimmed piece and makes its appearance when cold in the same shape. If a little more care were taken in the cooking and in pressing it properly when it is cold it would in pressing it properly when it is cold it would look better and taste better. For the food that is attractive to the eye is better to the taste than that to the looks of which no pains have

Then there is the question of poultry. For some reason, I have never been able to understand, this is generally scarcer on the farm than anything else,—and this, too, when the poultry is not sent to market. If the younger chickens have to be sold the older fowls can at least he served to the home people and if propleast be served to the home people and if properly cooked and well seasoned may be good cold as well as hot.

cious dressings that may be made without it. As for the materials of which the salads are to be made, they are to be had on a farm or in the country for the picking. There is hardly a fresh vegetable that is not good in a salad, there is hardly any kind of cold meat that may not be used in one.

All the house tener may do is to give this hardly any kind of cold meat that may not be used in one.

All the housekeeper may do is to give this matter her attention in order to make her work simpler and her table better. When I say to make her work simpler, I do not mean that in certain ways she may not have to take pains she has not taken before. But it will be worth while. If she goes in for salads and good cold meats she can do up her preparations at once and then have more time free from the bondage of the kitchen stove. When she has no hot meat to get ready for her noonday dinner the work of cooking the vegetables will not be so trying. When she has made a salad that with the beans for the Sunday dinner will make enough of a feast to satisfy the family without a good deal of additional hot cookery, she has so much to the good.

Moreover, she can have the thought that she is doing her family good. It is much better for them to have less meat and more green food in the warm days. Nothing is more wholesome than a well prepared salad, not made of rich things, but of simple ingredients that tempt the appetite and do not upset the stomach. I have tried in this paper to give a few hints that may be helpful to the women all over the country who have to work hard and carry burdens at which many people never guess. I wish I knew you all. I do know enough of you to make me feel when I write these things to you that I am writing to those who are my friends or whom I hope to make my friends. I only wish you would write to me and let me know if there are any suggestions I could answer that would be of any help to you.

BEEF A LA MODE.

For this get a piece of beef from the round. It should not weigh less than seven pounds and may be anywhere from that to twelve pounds in weight, according to the size of the family. Bind around it a strip of stout muslin that will keep it in shape and prevent its spreading when it is cooked. If your butcher will do it, get him to lard it with strips of salt pork and if he will not, do it yourself. Take a narrow bladed sharp knife and thrust it through the meat, making slits through it and put the strips of pork in these, leaving them sticking out a little below and above. Make other slits and stuff into these a mixture of chopped pork and fine bread crumbs, well seasoned with pepper, sweet herbs, such as summer savoury, thyme and sweet marjoram, and a little dry mustard. Moisten all with vinegar and cram this forcemeat into the slits and rub it into the surface of the meat. This dish will be more highly flavored if to a cupful of vinegar you will add half a teaspoonful each of allspice, cloves, pepper, salt and mustard and a teaspoonful each of such sweet herbs as have been mentioned above and let the meat lie in this several hours or over night, turning it several times. Even without this it is good. Put it into a broad pot, pour over it enough hot water to nearly cover it and let it cook slowly at the rate of half an hour to the pound. Turn it once. A cupful of the broth from it may be thickened for gravy and the rest will do for soup. When the meat goes from the table put it under a heavy weight and leave it until it is cold. Slice it across the grain. It is good to look at and good to eat.

the deed being traced home to its actor.

As Rose listened, she thought the firing became narrowed and more concentrated to one point. This point appeared to shift, and to grow more remote. Suddenly, even while this continued, her quick ear detected a struggle, an occasional shot, and the bustle of some movement nearer the house. Was an attack pending against them? She walked to the window with the intention, if possible, of learning the cause of this singular movement. Kate rushed before her, and threw her arms around her neck.

neck.

"Don't, sister, don't expose yourself."

Suddenly a rapid discharge of pistols, musketry, etc., took place apparently very near the house. Rose, alive to the situation of her lover, detected that it was in the direction and certainly near the outhouse, in which Walter was confined. She shuddered, and covered her face with her hands. The discharge was followed by the tramp of horses' feet, the clash of steel, a shriek, then a loud cheer and a furious rush of horsemen galloping through the grounds. Rose darted to the window, and threw open the shutters. A party of horsemen were crushing through the shrubbery, but making for the spur of the forest. Was she mistaken? Did she not for a single instant catch a glimpse of one form towering high and nobly, which could belong to no other than Walter Armstrong? Had he escaped? A thrill of joy ran through her veins. Hope was more than fear, and she staggered to a chair. As she did so, she saw the face of Mr. Metcalf looking at her through the doorway, beaming and delighted. He was safe then. A thanksgiving went up to Heaven from the depths of Rose's heart.

The firing was becoming distant, scattered, and faint. It soon ceased altogether. In a few moments Major Cleveland and his troop came galloping up. The major leaped from his horse and entered the drawing-room.

"The danger is over, ladies. The enemy is put to flight. I hope you will resume your dancing without fear. I shall guard more carrilly against a repetition of such an alarm."

Captain Arbald burst into the room, and whispered a word to his commander.

"Escaped! We've been tricked."

"It was all a ruse, sir, to effect a rescue of the prisoner."

"Are you the victors, gentlemen?" said Rose, rising, and smiling with a quiet sarcasm that triving and smiling with a quiet sarcasm that triving and smiling with a quiet sarcasm that triving and and sin the same triving and smiling with a quiet sarcasm that triving and the sarcasm that triving and the sarcasm that triving and the sarcasm that the same triving and sa neck.

prisoner."

"Are you the victors, gentlemen?" said Rose, rising, and smiling with a quiet sarcasm that stirred up all the major's rage.

"Your precious lover——"

A look of concentrated indignation from Rose checked his impertinence; and, turning to the company, the major bowed, hoped that they would resume their pleasures, and walked from the room.

"Where are the guard?" said he to Arbald, as soon as they had withdrawn from the presence of the ladies.

"Both badly wounded."

soon as they had withdrawn from the presence of the ladies.

"Both badly wounded."

"A curse upon them."

"It was adroitly planned, sir. We followed will-o'-the-wisp, while the real enemy was near at home. The whole party probably did not number twenty men. A half dozen lured us from the spot, the rest made a rush for the prisoner. Both of the guard were struck down, but, though wounded, they recount with clearness the whole affair."

Captain Arbald's surmises were mainly true. Walter's companions, whom he had left in the forest, finding that he had fallen into the enemy's hands, roused up the neighbors and effected his rescue in the manner we have seen. Major Cleveland took a turn up and down the plazza, after listening to the account of the affair from Arbald. "Humph!" muttered heat last, "I believe it is fortunate, after all. I was in a perplexity. Fate has decided for me."

He had spoken aloud. Rose was on the plazza unseen by him, and overheard him. "Magnanimously said, my dear major. The battle is over, and let us be friends. Will you dance?" "Madame, I yield to a woman. You fight with weapons I do not understand—" "With wit, eh?"

The major wiped his brow.

"Really, Miss Elsworth, you have me at every point. I am a prisoner at your mercy. May not tonight's work be forgotten?"

"Yes, if you seek no vengeance upon Armstrong."

"You have my signet."

"True. I will trust you."

The pleasures were resumed, and the ball continued to early daylight, when the guests dispersed, conducted to their respective homes by companies of the troops. A little after noon Major Cleveland resumed his march, and the mansion resumed its old quiet and peace.

When all were gone, Rose went to her father's library, seated herself at his feet, and confessed all. He was astounded. The perfidious scheme of Cleveland's aroused his indignation—and entirely justified, in his eyes, the extreme measures of his daughter.

"I designed it otherwise, Rose, but you have shown me the extent of your devotion to Walter. I will hope that time will union."

That very day Mr. Metcalf came to Rose, and after much hemming and hawing, asked her consent to his marriage with Bridget.
"Oho," said she, "then you've been making love under the rose all this time!"
The consent was freely given.
Six months after the events above related, the marriage between Walter and Rose was solemnized, publicly. Walter continued in the service during the war, and lived for many years after in peace and plenty. after in peace and plenty.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.
Caleb Brett, an aged and prominent citizen of Mansfield village, drew a considerable sum of money from the local savings bank on a certain forenoon and was seen to enter Purinton's mill located near the edge of the village. He did not reappear and later a searching party found his old beaver hat on a slab pile at the foot of a sluice leading from the upper part of the mill. There was also found on the slab a portion of an orange that Brett had been eating as he walked into the mill. It was considered probable that the old man had come to his death by falling down the sluice, but no one could explain just how. The strange part of the affair was that his body had been removed. The length of the sluice was such that it seemed certain that death must have resulted from the fall. Several persons, his nephew, George Brett, Arthur Wing, the village printer, Daniel Purinton, owner of the mill, were known to have been in or about the mill near the time when the old man disappeared.

CHAPTER III.

"WHERE DID YOU GET THAT PAPER?"

"WHERE DID YOU GET THAT PAPER?"

ETECTIVE Ordwell was spending a sultry afternoon in his room at the village hotel. He was going over some two hundred pages of manuscript that embodied the results of his several weeks' of work on the Brett mystery. He was forced to admit to himself, as he had already stated to Mrs. Erskine, Caleb Brett's daughter and his employer, that his results were far from definite.

Nevertheless, Mrs. Erskine had asked him to continue his work, and to co-operate with the county officers. Therefore Ordwell had asked the high sheriff to call around that afternoon and go over the matter with him.

There came a vigorous plack! plack! on the cracked door of the detective's room. He opened to admit the red-headed nigh sheriff.

"I've brought Seleetman Andrews with me," explained the perspiring visitor. "He thinks that so long's the town has a big reward up it's only right that he should know how things is movin'."

The detective proceeded immediately to busi-

The detective proceeded immediately to business.

"Probably, Mr. Sheriff," he said, "your findings as you have hunted for evidence correspond pretty nearly with mine. I'm not going to trouble you with all this stuff here," he said, fingering the pages of his manuscript book. "I simply state the many points of my discoveries and will ask you if your line of evidence corresponds with mine.

"Now it appears to be proved that on the 24th day of June at about 10 o'clock in the forenoon Caleb Brett drew from the bank the sum of $1500 and started for Purinton's mill. He had previously stated to the treasurer that he was going to loan the money to Daniel Purinton. The latter wanted to pay for repairs that he had been making on his mill. Squire Brett went down to the mill with the money because, so the treasurer understood him to say, he wanted to look the Purinton property over carefully before he advanced the loan."

"That's all jest as I get it," broke in the

"But before Brett went to the mill he dropped into the office of the Mansfield Mirror and told old man Wing and son Arthur that he had directed the bank folks to foreclose on the mortgage that the bank holds on the Mirror property. Brett was angry at Arthur the mortgage that the bank holds on the Mir-ror property. Brett was angry at Arthur Wing because the young man had been bold enough to pay his addresses to Grace Erskine, the squire's grand-daughter. It is admitted that young Wing talked roughly to the old man, who went away vowing vengeance. Young Wing repented, so he says, and for his father's sake started out to hunt Brett up and apologize and entreat the squire to leave his father in peace.

father in peace.

"Now, gentlemen,"—the detective became earnest and put up his forefinger to mark his points—"there were three men who are admitted to have been looking for Caleb Brett that forenoon. One was his nephew George Brett who had driven over from Mansfield Corner to have it out with the old man about that girl he was determined to marry despite the girl he was determined to marry despite the old man's commands. There was Daniel Purinton who wanted to borrow the money Brett drew from the bank. There was Arthur Wing, lover of Grace Erskine, who wanted to coax Brett not to turn his father and himself out of the Mirror office."

Now follow carefully what Hawkes says: after the Squire had gone into the mill Arthur Wing came hurrying along. A few minutes after Wing had gone in George Brett came out, got into his team and rode back past the store. He reined up at the junction of the road with Elm street and after thinking a moment rode off down Elm right past the Squire's house and away towards the past the Squire's house and away towards the Corner. "A minute or so before Purinton reached the door of the mill Wing came out and walked back up the street. When the two men met, Hawkes, who was sitting on his store platform, noticed that they exchanged a few words. Purinton went into the mill and Wing came along the street. About half way between the mill and Hawkes' store is a little brook. Hawkes noticed without thinking especially about it at the time that Wing stopped at the brook, went down beside the culvert and washed his hands. He wiped them on the grass and then came down beside the culvert and washed his hands. He wiped them on the grass and then came past the store and started up Elm street toward the Squire's house. But he stopped and cried out to Hawkes: 'Are you sure that you haven't seen the Squire come back from the mill and go home?' 'He's in the mill,' said Hawkes. 'No, he isn't,' said Wing. 'I hunted all around and shouted for him. George Brett had been hunting there, too, and he told me he couldn't find his uncle.' Hawkes says that Wing then allowed that he wouldn't hunt any more for they were busy at the office printing the paper. Then he went down street. Daniel Purinton remained at the mill an hour. He had a bump on his head and his hand was bleeding a bit when he came to the store. He explained to remained at the mill an nour. He had a bump on his head and his hand was bleeding a bit when he came to the store. He explained to Hawkes that the gate lever was a new one and the workmen had adjusted it so poorly that it stuck. While he was working at it it slipped and hit him a clip. He bought some courtplaster and liniment of Hawkes and went home. He did say before going that he hadn't been able to find old man Brett at the mill. Hawkes allowed that the Squire might have slipped out when he wasn't noticing and had gone up across the field to his house.

"Those are the direct statements of Grocer Hawkes, gentlemen, without theories. Unless we get some more facts to go with them, theorizing isn't going to do us much good. It's complicated."

"How about that hand-washing that Wing did?" the selectman inquired.

"How about that hand-washing that Wing did?" the selectman inquired.
"Says he had made up his mind to look the Squire up at the house and so he stopped to wash some of the ink off his hands. Thought he might see the women folks, you understand." "It's quite reasonable when a fellow's in love," assented the selectman.
"George Brett," continued the detective, "says that he hunted for his uncle in the mill. Thought the old man had come in ahead of him. He went down on the lower floors for he "says that he nunted for his uncle in the mill. Thought the old man had come in ahead of him. He went down on the lower floors for he thought the old man might be looking the property over. Couldn't find him. He shouted several times, but the water running over the dam was making so much noise that there wasn't much use in trying to be heard. George says that he went all over the under part of the mill. When he came back onto the upper floor that you enter from the street, you understand, there stood Arthur Wing. Brett has been hinting around, when he has been drunk, that Wing jumped and looked guilty, but I don't take much stock in Brett's statements along certain lines. Wing told Brett that he had seen nothing of the old man, though he had been told that the Squire was right ahead of him. Both claim that the thought occurred to them that perhaps the Squire had peeped into the mill and then had gone across the field to dinner. George says that he did think of stopping at the house and hesitated at the junction of the road. But he realized that he had been drinking too much to talk with his uncle of the road. Wing, who staid at the mill for a moment in the hope that the Squire might appear from somewhere, so he asserts, changed his mind, too, about going to the house.

"Purinton vows that he didn't see the Squire anywhere. He staid around the mill till noon, puttering, and then went to dinner. I asked him if he noticed anything on the top of the slab pile when he was in the under part of the mill and he said he didn't look to see. But he thinks he would have seen a body if it had been there."

old man's commands. There was Daniel Purinton who wanted to borrow the money Brett drew from the bank. There was Arthur Wing, lover of Grace Erskine, who wanted to coax Brett not to turn his father and himself out of the Mirror office."

"And, as I get the evidence together," said the sheriff, "those parties made a pretty close connection at the mill about the time Squire Brett got there."

"Just so," agreed the detective. "It is on this phase of the situation that Hawkes, the grocer, becomes our most important witness. He probably tells you the same story that he does me. According to Hawkes there was a man in that mill waiting for Caleb Brett."

"George Brett," said the sheriff leaning forward eagerly. "He—"

"Just a moment; let's not hurry," protested the detective. "But when you go to passing motives around don'tskip Arthur Wing. He was dead in love with Grace Erskine and rode past the store to the mill. The treasurer had told him that the old man had started for the mill. Hawkes says that George Brett came along from the direction of the savings bank in his team and rode past the store to the mill. The pretty soon along came the squire, bought an orange of Hawkes and walked away peeling it. He went to the mill, too."

"Find man ne sald he didn't look to see, But he thinks he would have seen a body if thad been there."

The three men, detective, sheriff and select-man, sat in silence and looked at each wrinkling their brows in thought.

"If there was anything crooked in this matter it strikes me that George Brett had the most to gain," said the sheriff. "He wanted to gain," said the she to tell."

"It isn't a bit surprising to hear Dan'l Purinton talk that way," broke in Selectman Andrews. "He's always been as close-mouthed as tophet—and there don't anything git out of tophet. But as to Arthur Wing—he has always seemed to be one of the most open-hearted chaps in the world. I don't see how it happens that he has anything to cover up."

Detective Ordwell locked his papers into his trunk. "There is one more thing, gentlemen," he continued. "Last night the women-folks at the Brett house told me that George Brett had blurted out something rather peculiar, to say the least. He had been drinking and was very angry at the time, and those elements are to be blurted out something rather peculiar, to say the least. He had been drinking and was very angry at the time, and those elements are to be taken into account. Brett, so the women-folks told me, declared that he knew that his uncle had been murdered and furthermore if he wanted to do so he could put his finger on the man who did the job."

"Sho!" ejaculated the detective, his eyes bulging. Then after a moment's pause the sheriff went on, his wrath blazing out. "By Jupiter, I think it's about time to give some of these knowin' people a chance to tell what they know. Here's this one and the other promanadin' around town and sayin' what they have a mind to and keepin' still about what they have a mind to. If I don't make an arrest pretty soon I can see my finish when election comes along. And——" the sheriff paused and smiled grimly—"If I arrest the wrong man it will be worse for me than——" He scratched his chin and fell to musing.

"Mr. Sheriff," said the detective, "can you take a short ride with me after supper?"

"Over to Mansfield Corner."

"Are ve thinkin' that it will be a good idea

"Over to Mansfield Corner.

"Are ye thinkin' that it will be a good idea to give George Brett a chance to git rid of some of his wide and extended knowledge?"

"It occurred to me that it would be well to do so," the detective answered quietly. They found George Brett at his clothing store. He greeted them rather ungraciously and when they asked for a half hour's talk with him he asked them to come to the hotel. with him he asked them to come to the hotel. He explained as they walked along that he and his wife were stopping at the Oriental. "We're going to keeping house as soon as the estate is whacked up," said he. "Maude says she doesn't propose to start up for herself until she can do it in style."

can do it in style."

A young woman with many frills arose languidly from a sofa in the hotel room and greeted the men with a bad affectation of gentility. At the request of George she set out a decanter and her husband and the high sheriff partook liberally.

"It might be well for Mrs. Brett to leave us a moment," suggested the detective. But the young woman seated herself on the arm of the big chair in which her husband was sitting.

"You understand of course that I wish to talk with you about the disappearance of your uncle—the old matter," commenced the detective.

"Of course," snapped the young man. "I'm used now to having detectives dogging around after me."
"Perhaps if you had told your full story, honestly, at the start, you would have been chased less, said the detective quietly. Brett started to speak, but the officer went on quickly. "I was obliged to work the statement out of you processed as you wall remember."

ly. "I was obliged to work the statement out of you piecemeal, as you well remember."
"I have simply been attending to my own business," growled Brett.
"You have told your relatives that you know who killed your uncle and are not going to disclose his name. I suppose you call that attending to your own business, don't you?"
The detective shot his bolt fairly.

Young Brett changed countenance and commenced to bluster. His wife whispered in his ear and he smiled at her and said, "You fellows don't get a word out of me, understand? Isn't that so, Maude?"
"George and I have decided that there has been too much meddling where we're concerned," she remarked, with a toss of her chin.

"But consider your position in the matter," expostulated the detective. "You were known to have been in that mill at the time your uncle entered. You profit largely by his decease. "Do you mean to insinuate here in the presence of my wife that I had anything to do with Caleb Brett's stepping out?" he demanded

"I simply state that your position is suspi-

"Yes, you can, my dear sir. You can at once give us such information as is in your possession and which you ought to have turned over long ago if you know anything about this matter."

"Then both of you go out and hoot," growled Brett. "You won't get a word out of me. 'Tisn't any of your business."
"Is that final, Mr. Brett?" asked the detective.

"That's just what it is." The young man leaned back with a sneer on his face.

Here occurred a startling interruption. The high sheriff leaped to his feet, his face fairly purple with rage and excitement. All the irritation that had nagged him for weeks, on account of the slurs and complaints at the inability of the officers of the county to fasten on the guilty person, now burst out.

bility of the officers of the county to fasten on the guilty person, now burst out.

"You stand there and thumb your nose at the law, do ye," he shouted, brandishing his fists at the shrinking George. "You and that millhand wife of yours sneer at me, do ye? I have felt right along, George Brett, that you of all men on the face of God's green earth had most reason to wish your uncle tucked away. Now you go to braggin' to your relatives about the service some man has done you by getting your uncle out of the way. Who was that man? It was the man who was waitin' there your uncle out of the way. Who was that man? It was the man who was waitin' there in the mill that day—the man that was prowling down stairs, the man that is settin' there in that chair."

The high sheriff with trembling hands drew The high sheriff with trembling hands drew handcuffs from his pocket and fairly stuttering in his excitement he cried, "I now do my duty, George Brett, by arrestin' you for the murder of your uncle, Caleb. Stick out your hands, and may God have mercy on your soul," he concluded hardly knowing that he was using the familiar formula of the sentencing judge. As soon as the irons were on the detective drew the wrathful sheriff to one side of the room and whispered, "Haven't you been a bit hasty in this matter, Mr. Sheriff?"

"No, by —" the detective blurted, dabbing his handkerchief at the bleeding stripes on his cheek. But he checked himself and added in low tones, "Well, p'haps I have been. That drink of whiskey and them slurs were a leetle too much for my nerves."

"Wouldn't it be better to call it off?" suggested the detective.

gested the detective.

"Wouldn't it be better to call it off?" suggested the detective.

The detective glanced at the young man who stood with his wife at the opposite side of the room. "I've arrested him and now I'll stand behind it. I'll own up that I didn't intend to do it, exactly, but now it's done and I'll play my hand out. Let him go on the stand and talk to the judge, now."

That night a deputy sheriff of the county slept on a cot outside George Brett's door.

But over at Mansfield village stirring events had been transpiring in the absence of the sheriff and Ordwell. That same afternoon Arthur Wing had blanched and trembled when a scrap of paper had been shaken under his nose by a state detective. Then the officer had demanded sternly:

"Where did you get that paper?"

And when Arthur Wing had not been able to answer they had slipped the handcuffs on his wrists. That night Deputy sheriff Jason Dustin slept outside the door of the young printer. The smouldering rivalry between the high sheriff and the state detective had blazed up so hotly that within a dozen hours the county was on fire from end to end. ## CHAPTER IV.

EARLY a week had elapsed and the bright winter sun was shining into Mrs. bright winter sun was shining into Mrs.
Joycotte's quiet parlor, one morning, when Flossie Field seemed to wake from a season of blank unconsciousness.
"Have I been asleep?" she asked, vaguely. "Oh,—I remember now."
She clasped both hands over her eyes and sank back on the pillowed sofa. Mrs. Joycotte came to her side with a cup of fragrant beef tea.

"Drink this, Flossie," said she. "You'll be

"Drink this, Flossie," said she. "You'll be better soon."
Flossie obeyed, her sweet and submissive nature asserting itself at last. From that moment she buried within her heart the ashes of that terrible experience. No tears, or wailings could bring back the dear mother who was gone, but life was still a burden to be borne as bravely as possible for the sake of those around her. She gently clasped Mrs. Jovcotte's hand.

those around her. She gently clasped Mrs. Joycotte's hand.
"How came I here?" she asked.
"Well—we didn't know what else to do with you," hesitated Mrs. Joycotte, "and Mrs. Wurtemburg, if that is her name, refused to keep you, so they brought you here, where you are very welcome, my dear."
Flossie half rose. "But I have no right to be here," said she, "with people on whom I have no claim!"
"Have you no friends or relations?" asked Mrs. Joycotte.

"Have no claim!"

"Have you no friends or relations?" asked Mrs. Joycotte.

"No one in the world," said Flossie. "Only myself. Let me go away,"

"Nonsense, child," said Mrs. Joycotte.

"Why, you couldn't walk to the corner. Don't you know you have been very sick?"

Once more Flossie dropped her head. "I think," murmured she, "that you must be as kind as the angels."

Later in the week, Mr. and Mrs. Joycotte consulted together. "We must get something for her to do, George," declared the lady. "That is proper, of course," said her husband. "She is not one to live idly on other people."

"She's a sweet lassie. I only wish I could adopt her."

The minister shrugged his shoulders. "Too expensive a luxury," said he smiling. "But I'll try my best to find a bread-winner for her. I only wish she were not so pretty."

"Is that a crime, George?"

"Well, it almost seems so in this case," sighed he. "Where is she?"

"Gone for a little walk," said his wife. "She was very restless to breathe the fresh air and I.

he. "Where is she?"
"Gone for a little walk," said his wife. "She was very restless to breathe the fresh air and I thought it might be well. She won't be away long."

But it was not only for air and exercise that Flossie Field had gone. She had long been maturing a plan in her secret heart. Among her few possessions were a turquoise ring and an antique watch seal which had been her mother's. Only the fact that she wore them in a chamois leather case suspended from her neck had kept them from Mrs. Wurtemburg, who had confiscated every other belonging of her hapless lodgers!

"I am sure they must be very valuable."

"I am sure they must be very valuable," thought Flossie, "and if I could only sell them I could pay Mrs. Joycotte something for my expenses."

So she crept out into the spring sunshine and entering the first jewelry store found, unfortunately for her, that it was one of those quiet, exclusive places which dealt mostly in antiques, old coins and gems dear to collectors. Flossie who had determined to be very composed, felt herself tremble as she laid the chamois bag on the counter.

"If you please," said she, "I would like to sell these articles."

The clerk looked totally uninterested. "We are not buying much," said he. "However, I'll look at them."

More nervous than ever, Flossie pulled the string into a knot.

"Will you open it, please?" said she. He obeyed, staring rather superciliously at the two treasures.

"Is this all?"
"Yes," faltered Flossie, feeling her heart sink within her.
"I don't think we care about buying," he observed, coldly.

"Oh, please do!" cried Flossie. "I need the money so much."

The clerk looked at her again. After all he was only human and Flossie was so anxious and so divinely pretty.

"What's your figure?" said he, curtly.
"I don't think I quite know what they are worth," murmured Flossie.

"Oh, you want me to fix a price?"
"Yes. please."

"Oh, you want me to fix a price?"
"Yes, please."
"Three dollars for the pair, then," said the clerk. "And that's more than you'll get anywhere else for them." said the Flossie's countenance fell. "But my father gave six dollars for the ring alone," faltered she. "It was a birthday present."

"That don't signify," said the clerk. "It's

"That don't signify," said the clerk. "It's

"I must take what you offer," said Flossie, but as she spoke a tear brimmed over her eyelids and fell, with a plash, on the counter. She had always believed so firmly in the value

She had always believed so firmly in the value of the blue ring, and the intaglio seal. It was so bitter a disillusion.

"Your pearl stud is matched perfectly, Mr. Mayne," said the jeweler's voice—how silky soft and unlike his brusque accents to Flossie Field, but his customer was gazing after the light figure flitting to the door whose tearful eyes saw nothing but three crumpled bills in her hand.

"Oh, is it? All right," said Mayne, hurriedly. "I'll step in later. I—I've forgotten something."

thing."
He left the young man staring after him and

CHAPTER V.

"Is this the place?" cried she.
But instead of leading her into the great vacant auditorium, with its dim, overarching dome, and lurking shadows below, Mr. Mayne opened a little green-baize door, artfully concealed under silken draperies, and conducted her along a dusky passage to a snug little room where a stout, bald-headed man sat at a desk, seeming to fill the whole apartment.
"Well, Mayne," said he, looking up, absently.
"Well, Danton," was the cheery response, "I've brought you a new young lady for Cleopatra's body guard. This is Miss Field."
For Flossie had told him all about herself, including her name, in the long hansom ride.
Mr. Danton took his cigar from his mouth and stared at Flossie until the crimson color rose to her cheek.

"It is Kismet," he muttered, pulling at his drooping moustache. "By all the gods, here comes a shower to speed my cause along." For the pavement was already sprinkled with bright drops from a passing cloud above, and he opened his umbrella as he hurried towards Flossie. "Oh!" said he. "Pleased to meet you, miss. Turn around, please. Hum—ha. Nice figure. Carries herself well, too. Know anything about dancing, my dear?" "No, sir," answered Flossie, almost inaudibly.

respondent in tumbrena as he nurried towards Flossie.

"I beg your pardon," said he, ingratiatingly, "but won't you accept my escort for a little while? The rain is coming down in good earnest and you have no umbrella. Besides, you are wearing black. What has happened?"

And Flossie, weeping afresh, confided to him her loss. At any other time she would have been more guarded, but just now any friendly voice was welcome, and his expressions of sympathy were inexpressibly grateful.

"I've got a dear mother of my own," said Mayne, whose maternal ancestor it is needless to add, had been dead for years, "so I know how to pity you."

"Please don't detain me," sobbed Flossie.
"I'm in a great hurry to get back to Mr. Joycotte's." bly. "She'll pick it up in no time," interposed Mayne. "I told her you'd pay her ten dollars if she suits."

Mayne. "I told her you'd pay her ten dollars if she suits."

"All right," said the manager, selecting a fresh cigar, as if the matter possessed no particular interest to him—and Flossie followed Mayne into the sinuous corridor again.

"Why did he call me 'my dear'?" said she. "He is a stranger to me."

"Oh, they all do that," replied Mayne, lightly. "It means nothing."

"Where are we going now?" asked Flossie.

"I'm taking you to Lavoglio's—Madame Adalina Lavoglio's," Mayne answered. "Every neophyte has to go to her."

"What is a—neophyte?" Flossie asked, lifting her eyes to his face with childlike curiosity.

"Oh, I don't know—a learner, I suppose—a beginner. You are a neophyte, Miss Field."

"But what have I got to learn?"

"Lots of things. First of all, dancing. Cleopatra's attendants all have to dance."

"Do you think I can learn?"

"Of coarse you can—why shouldn't you?" said Mayne. "Dancing always comes natural to a fairy and that's what you are the start what you are to the start what you are the you are the start what you are the start what you are the you are "I'm in a great hurry to get back to Mr. Joycotte's."

"Oh, the old clergyman you mentioned," said Mayne. "I know him very well. St. Viga's, isn't it?"

"His wife is going to get me something to do," said Flossie. "That is, if she can."

"You would like a situation?" he asked, still in the same kind voice, full of friendly interest. Flossie looked wistfully at him. "I must do something," said she, "but good situations are so hard to obtain. Mr. Joycotte says—"

"Now I wonder," said Mayne, as if thinking aloud, "if I couldn't think of something?"

"Oh, could you?" Flossie stopped short with flushed cheeks. "A companion, perhaps, or a nursery governess?"

For he seemed so genial and gracious, and she, poor child, was so friendless!

Mayne paused as if considering. "Not exactly that," said he, "but I've a friend who is manager of a select theater, where they are bringing out a little operetta."

"Oh, I couldn't sing!" cried Flossie, intensely disappointed.
"A new operetta." went on Mayne, "and he

"Of coarse you can learn?"
said Mayne. "Dancing always comes natural to a fairy, and that's what you are. It's only the technique that will bother you."
"Well, what else?" eagerly questioned Flossie.

Flossie.
"Just a little singing. You're to be in the chorus, you know."

"I think I could manage that."
"I am sure you could. Here's the street where Lavoglio lives. A stuffy old hole, isn't it? But comic opera people always live in narrow streets and rattle-trap houses. I've noticed it, scores of times."

of times."

Flossie was thinking. "How much will you pay me, did you say?" asked she. "Ten dollars?"

"Just at first, yes."

"A month?"

"No, Miss Curiosity, ten dollars a week."

Flossie's eyes sparkled.

"Oh, you'll soon go through ten dollars a week!" said Mayne, laughing.

"And all through your kindness," said she.
"I am so much obliged to you, Mr. Mayne. I don't know how to thank you."

"Then don't try," said Mayne, lightly.
"He led his companion under the carved door-bringing out a little operetta."

"Oh, I couldn't sing!" cried Flossie, intensely disappointed.

"A new operetta," went on Mayne, "and he wants a lot of young ladies for peasants and rustic dances, and all that."

Flossie's eyes sparkled. "But I can't dance, either," sighed she.

"You can learn, can't you? It's nothing very complicated, I fancy."

Again Flossie hesitated. "I—don't think mother would have been willing," said she.

"She never approved of theaters."

"Oh, this isn't the ordinary thing at all," persuaded Mayne. "There are some very nice young ladies there, and it's a pleasant place to begin in. I could introduce you to an elderly lady there whom I know and she could help you, just at first."

"It's very kind of you," said Flossie, remembering how severely she had judged this kindhearted man. "I'll ask Mr. Joycotte."

"If you do that we're all up," said Mayne impatiently. "The place is only open for a short time—it may be filled before now for all I know. We ought to decide at once. But if you don't like it there's nothing more to be said!"

And he made a movement as if to turn away. "Here we are."

He led his companion under the carved doorway of an old house, which had been, in its day, an elegant mansion, but was now let in floors, and preceded her up a shabby staircase into a dreary room, whose yellow-silk-curtained windows were not over clean. The carpet was faded and a bunch of withered daffodils hung over the edge of a cracked was. A pretty hung over the edge of a cracked vase. A pretty girl, fashionably dressed, sat by the window, supporting her chin in her hands. She looked up listlessly at the entrance of the newcomers.

Mayne lifted his hat carelessly.
"Is Madame Lavoglio in?" said he.
"I don't know," said the girl. "I'm waiting to see her myself."

said!"

And he made a movement as if to turn away.

"I might try," said Flossie, and then added, with a shy little laugh, "here we are, both standing under your umbrella and the rain has stopped long ago. Just look at that rainbow!"

"A good omen," said Mayne, lightly. "Here's cabby," beckoning to an approaching hansom. "Are we going to ride?" asked his companion.

"It's too far to walk. Why, how serious you are looking!"

Flossie smiled. "Am I?" she queried. "Do Mayne drew forward a chair for Flossie, and, opening the inner door, went in without further ceremony. The pretty girl stared at

"Are you out of a place, too?" she asked.
Flossie started a little. "Yes," she hesitated.
But I hope to obtain one."

"But I hope to obtain one."

"Is he pulling the wires for you?"

"I don't quite understand," faltered Flossie.
The pretty girl laughed. "Oh, I've seen him before," said she. "He knows lots of theater people. Say, what are you going to do?"

"I don't know yet."

thing with him. How much are you going to get?"

"Ten dollars a week if——"

"Ten—dollars!" The eyebrows went up.

"Well, you are lucky—for a beginner!"

"Don't they pay beginners so much?"

"Not much they don't!" sniffed Rosalie.

"You're lucky to get the experience at nothing at all, and find yourself. That chap storing you up, ain't he?"

"How do you mean?"

The girl only laughed. "I wish Lavoglio would hurry," said she.

"Is she going to teach you?"

"She can't teach me much, I reckon." The girl buttoned her soiled tan glove. "All the same, she needn't keep me here forever. I've been cooling my heels for an hour already, but Lavoglio never had any conscience."

Just then Mayne came out. "Madame Lavoglio will see you," said he to Flossie. "She's very much engaged this morning, but I've stated your case and she will spare you a few minutes. I'll wait here."

And Flossie found herself in a second room, even drearier than the first, where sat a richlyattired old woman, with silvery hair dressed in Pompadour style above her forehead. She looked keenly at the girl.

"Sit down, child," said she, eying her harder than ever. "How old are you?"

"I am eighteen."

"And you want to go on in 'Cleopatra'?"

"I am eighteen."

"And you want to go on in 'Cleopatra'?"

"I' am eighteen."

"And you want to go on in 'Cleopatra'?"

"I' want—oh, so very much—to earn a little money to pay my mother's burial expenses and the honest debts I owe," said Flossie, her heart touched by a certain kindness in the old woman's voice, and then, in her simple way she poured out her whole life story.

"Humph!" commented Madame Lavoglio.
"I don't think I ever saw a case exactly like

"Oh, you'll succeed fast enough," said the old woman. "But do you want my serious advice on this matter?"

"I should be more than thankful for it."

"Then," spoke the Madame, rising from her chair and leaning forward until her hooked nose nearly touched Flossie's cheek,—"then go home to this parson's wife and stay with her. Avoid places like this as you would avoid a pest house! Child, you have this day stood on the threshold of ruin! Go home and thank Heaven—if there be a Heaven—that you have escaped house! Child, you have this day stood on the threshold of ruin! Go home and thank Heaven—if there be a Heaven—that you have escaped this doom that hung over you!"

Flossie retreated a pace or two, and caught at the table for support.

"Child! child!" cried Madame Lavoglio in suppressed tones. "Are you blind? Can't you see what this all means? Joseph Danton is a scoundrel, and so is this man Mayne—a villain who passes in society as a gentleman and takes no thought beyond the passing hour! Oh, there's plenty such, and their victims are numbered by the score. But you are only a child and there's yet time for you to escape! Go home to your friends—and when you say your prayers tonight remember the old woman who warned you in your hour of peril!"

"But," gasped Flossie, "what shall Itell him?"

"Nothing. Never look upon his handsome, wicked face again! Here, I will let you out at the side door. Turn to the right and make all the haste you can. Earn your living by sewing, scrubbing, washing, if need be, but let these places alone! I had a pretty daughter once. She died young. If she had lived, she, too, might have been ignorant and unprotected, like you. Now go!" A Shipment from Ward's There must be considerable satisfaction to every man when he realizes that he has done some-thing wise and creditable, especially when it directly concerns the welfare of himself and family. Here is a man who is hauling a shipment home, content with the knowledge that all his supplies for several months have been purchased at whole: sale prices, or in other words at a saving of about 30 per cent over his home prices.

He has no cause to worry as to what he will find inside the boxes. He has received shipments from us before and knows that everything will be found first-class and exactly as represented. Even if something is wrong, he knows that no firm lu the country is more anxious to make it right than we are. We have customers everywhere—in every nook and corner of the United States. Beyond a doubt some of your neighbors deal with us. If you are not a heavy buyer, why not join with a neighbor and get your supplies by freight? It only takes 100 pounds to make a profitable freight shipment.

You may need a catalogue to start with. Our 1,000 page catalogue containing over 70,000 quotations and 17,000 illustrations will be sent on receipt of 15 cents to partly pay the postage. This catalogue is already in the homes of over 2,000,000 careful buyers and should be in your home also. Send for it to-day.

cious Records of the Doin's in the Cobb Corner Postoffice, "Writ out" by the Boy Behind the Counter.

[EDITOR'S NOTE. The quaint philosophers, the dry wags, the shrewd dickerers and the eminent yarn-spinners of the countryside make a forum of the country postoffice when there is room at the rear around the big stove. The stories and incidents on which some of the most successful human interest novels of the day are constructed come from the quaint loungers around the stores in Yankee communities. These official records of "Jeth's Croud" are to be taken down month by month for the readers of "Comfort," and we hope that as you become acquainted with the members of the "Congress" your interest in their discourse and stories will deepen. In the August number of "Comfort" the "Cobb's Corner Congress" will continue sessions.

ACRID smell of burned powder was wedded in the sum-mer air with the mingled odors of salt fish and kerosene that floated from the open doors of the vilopen doors of the village store and postoffice. About, in the dust, lay ragged fragments of exploded fire-cracker wrappings. Cobb's Corner had been celebrating ever since the first peep o' dawn. Now in the middle afternoon a hush had fallen and back shop and bask in the sun on the store platform. It was evident that all the firecrackers had been busted.

"This is the fust time I've dast to come out for a whiff of fresh air today," growled Uncle Wack Spofford, as he brushed the dirt off a section of the platform and gruntingly eased himself down with his cane between his knees.

"There's been almost too much patri'tism 'round here today to suit me clean up to the "Patri'tism be dum-flummixed," said Cap'n Jote Bailey scornfully. "If I had a boy that showed the kind of patri'tism that some of these young squirts have been actin' out here today I'd take 'em out in the mill pond and keelhaul 'em. "Tain't patri'tism ye see Fourth

"I jest reckin that's right, Cap'n," joined in Chet Woodrow. "Last night some of them tunketed boys in this village come along and tunketed boys in this village come along and stuck a cannon-cracker right in between the blind and the winder of our settin'-room. Busted the blind and the winder all to smash. I woke up and thought the house was tumblin' down. And while I was gittin' my pants on to go down an' mollywhop the life out of the young land piruts, I heerd one o' them say, 'Wal, I guess we've done all the damage we can round here. Let's go and pull old Seth Gifford's strawb'ry plants up and sling 'em over the fence. It'll s'prize him when he gets up in the mornin'.'
"I heerd they done it, too," said Woodrow.

"I heerd they done it, too," said Woodrow.
"And old Uncle Seth kind o' depends on them strawb'ry beds for his spare change to buy gros'ries in the summer."

"How's old Pudd Dobbs gittin' along?" asked Cap'n Bailey. "I heerd it hurt him consid'able when they put that Injy cracker under his Reckin he woke up right sudden. He started to run and the fire blazed up where the burnin' paper was stickin' to his pants and they had to chase him with one of these partunt extinguishers and squirt on him. It's the fust time I everheerd tell of a perambulatin' conflagration. But it was a pesky mean caper to play on a poor old man."

"Mean—of course it was mean," ejaculated Ezry Pitts. "And Hiram Dumphy got a black eye out of the scrape that will last him pretty

"Wal, when he came I down Hi Dumphy was standin' jest about right to git it, and Felix struck out and hit Hi in the eye. The swelled place looks like a thunder shower comin' up in the west at sunset. Hi turned to and licked Felix 'fore he stopped to think that the unfort'nit' critter couldn't help it. If the two of 'em had only used their muscle on them boys it would have been better for the neighborhood. This patri'tism bus'ness is well enough to talk about in a stump speech but when ye turn a

This patri'tism bus'ness is well enough to talk about in a stump speech but when ye turn a cust fool boy loose with it and a punch of fire-crackers 'tain't reel wholesome. When Tom Jefferson writ the Declaration of Independence he wa'n't reckinin' it would ever make the boys of this country independent enough so they would go to pullin' up old men's strawb'ry beds and set old chaps' pants afire. No, siree!

I reckin if Tom Jefferson had a-knowed about how many big city fires and busted fingers and bunged eyes and general devilishness was to come out of that Declaration of Independence a hundred years after, he'd a-thought twice be-fore he'd a-writ it."

a hundred years after, he'd a-thought twice before he'd a-writ it."

"Wal, 'tain't all one-sided," said Teed Strout.
"Doe Penely's been flyin' round all day like a red rag on a settin' hen's tail feathers. And he's still a-goin' it. I hear that Hen Torsey's boy has lost a thumb and tew fingers. Ziph Erskine's boy has had his thumb blowed off. Lester Strout has lost an eye and Ernest Drake has got pasted so full of powder that he looks like a raw egg with pepper sprinkled over it. The world ain't all one-sided. If ye go in to make other folks hump up ye'll most likely find yourself humpin' 'fore iong. I reckin that this will learn them boys a lesson that will last them over till next year."

"Ye can't tell nothin' about lessons lastin'," said Uncle Wack. "There's that boy of Springer's. Last year he had both arms blowed off while he was firing the cannon on the common. This year the darn fool was right around there ag'in while they was firin' the same cannon. Some one lit the corner of the paper but it looked as though it had gone out. That Springer boy walked up, danglin' them tew empty sleeves, and leaned over and phewed on the paper to start the blaze. Flish-h! off she went, and they don't think he'll save his eyes."

"Wal, any feller that don't know more'n that, wouldn't need eyes nor hands nor nothin' else, much," snorted Teed Strout.

"Wal, he hain't exactly intellectool," said Uncle Wack. "I've heern tell that down to the school the teacher asked him how many months there were in the year and he run his finger along under his nose, snuffed and said, "Septober, Ockjoober, Saint Padrick's Day," months there were in the year and he run his finger along under his nose, snuffed and said, "Septober, Ockjoober, Saint Padrick's Day, Fourth o' July an' Cris'mus'."

"The' hain't any too much brain goin' to waste out in your neighborhood, anyway," said Ezry Pitts with a great deal of sarcasm.

"Of course ye must know for I heerd ye was out there the other day lookin' for some brain matter to fill up the vacant spaces in your head," retorted Uncle Wack. "But ye didn't dast to buy any 'cause your head is so leaky it head," retorted Uncle Wack. "But ye didn't dast to buy any 'cause your head is so leaky it would all run out ag'in."

Pitts went on after the crowd had laughed: "A feller was tellin' me the other day that old Eph Sargent who lives out there has been braggin' around about his new wife. He says that she is the most complicated lady he ever met. Meant accomplished, ye know."

"Sho! Don't b'lieve he ever said that," said Uncle Wack.

"Sho! Don't b'lieve he ever said that," said Uncle Wack.

"He did, and I'll bet ye on it," persisted Pitts.
"Furthermore," continued Ezry stoutly, "old Eph had his colt out in the yard the other day and he hollered for his wife to come out and look at the animil. 'Sairy,' he yelled, 'come out and see this 'ere colt desert hisself.' And after she had been standin' on the platform of the porch a leetle while he hollered to her, "ye'd better take keer of yourself and not get cold. Better go in off that pizarro for ye're standin' there with your cores all disposed to the air."

Even the Postmaster came out at the sound

Even the Postmaster came out at the sound of the laughter.

"The Springer Hill neighborhood is jest about's good 's some others that I know about,' good 's some others that I know about,' good 's some others that I know about,' good 'loadic' a loadic' and I don't need to. Sometimes common sense is better a blame sight than book-larnin' that you don't know what to do with. What's the good of loadin' a jackass down with books? Now there's Ezry Pitts there—he's sent his boy away to college. But did ye hear what he and his boy done the other day?"

"No!" was the chorus.

"Don't ye go to tellin' no lies about me," warned Ezry.

"You go hop up," snapped Wack. "I've got the floor jest at the present time. Ye see," he went on, "Ezry's boy got home from school in June and Ez put him to work on the farm. Boy was mad and he growled so much that it made Ez mad and they was at it most all day, ev'ry time they met on the place. One day Ez was wheelin' out to the fields some late seed that he was going to plant and he met his boy walkin' in from the field to git some bug killer. There was a path across the field and about ten acres on each side of it. "Turn aout and lemme go past,' says Ez. 'Won't,' says the boy, 'turn out yerself.'

"Wals'r, they stood there and rowed it and jawed it for a time and neither of 'em would turn out. Ez set down on the handle of the wheelbarrer and the boy set down in the path and they staid there all the forenoon and all the afternoon and nigh onto ten o'clock that night.

"Do any of you folks believe such a gor-rammed lie as that 'ere?"

"Course "Course we do," was the answering shout. Pitts grabbed his paper of board nails and stumped away to his team. When he backed it out he found that the celebrating youngsters had shifted the wheels so that the rear end tipped down like a Roman chariot. But he was so angry that he wouldn't remain to remedy it and rode away doubled over his knees so as to keep from falling out behind. As soon as the Postmaster could get the ear of the crowd after this episode he unrolled a sheet of paper on which he had been at work with his marking brush. The paper bore this advertisement. answering shout.

advertisement.
"FOREFATHERS' NIGHT.

This evening in Hobbs' barn, rear of the postoffice, there will be a free entertainment for the benefit of the rising generation. All those patriotic boys who can prove that they honored their native country by assisting in the celebration at Cobb's Corner last night will be admitted free of charge."

"I guess that will take in all the young crit-ters that are responsible for the busted glass and gardens in this neighborhood," said the Postmaster to his little audience. And then he imposed secrecy and unfolded his plan. The aged conspirators listened and separated with chuckles.

o'clock he had admitted about fifty boys who apparently had shown a true bill why they should be allowed to enter. Some of the younger boys and a few of the village boys who were known to be real good boys were kept out.

Then, under the flicker of the lanterns appeared the Postmaster. He made a little speech in which he declared that the citizens of the town felt grateful to their town felt grateful to their enterprising boys for the manner in which things had been waked up the night before. But when the Post-master said that the village was especially proud of the manner in which the gardens and glass had been destroy-manner in which the gardens and glass had been destroyed an expression of apprehension came over the faces of his little audience. But they were not left long in suspense.

"Boys" continued the Postmaster, "we older fellers have decided to kind of even things up by claiming the night after the Fourth as Forefathers' Night. The idea is that you boys git so heated with patri'tism that ye're likely to burn your bearin's onless the forefathers cool ye down and git ye ready for the calm of the day after the Fourth."

The Postmaster picked up a nozzle that was sticking through a hole in the side of the barn. "That hose," he said, "connects with the big tank on the top of my store." He turned the faucet. A mighty stream, a forty foot stream, gushed out. With a yell the boys fled to the further corner of the barn but the water searched them out.

It deluged them, it soaked them, it beat and buffeted them. One by one or in little bunches the Postmaster and scut-tered out the door, dripping and screaming in fright. When the last had gone the Postmaster turned off the nozzle and went back to the street where the vil-lagers who were in the se-cret had stood to watch the outcome of the enterprise. There were trails of wet along the dust in all direc-tions, where the fugitives had scurried for home. It has not yet been deter-

It has not yet been determined whether or not "Forefathers' Night" is to be a regular institution at Cobb's Corner but the Postmaster declares that the town will probably adopt it as a regular celebration if another pane of glass is broken or another garden disturbed. And it may be that Cobb's Corner will be willing to dispose of its patent rights in the feature to other suffer-ing municipalities.

Forests Primeval.

HERE are few people who realize that there is a quiet little village where progress is something so wholly unknown that the residents are living almost as their ancestors did in France one hundred and fifty years ago.

ago.

In the Acadian village of Little Brook, N. S., are the descendants of those whom we read of in "Evangeline" the exiles of Grand Pre. Little Brook owes its existence to a cousin of the immortal notary of Grand Pre, by name Anselm LeBlanc, who with his family were deported to Salem, Mass., at the time of the expulsion from Grand Pre. For ten years he lived in Salem, fishing and farming, but became so dissatisfied with longing for his old home, with several Acadian families he traveled through the New England forests for a thousand miles on foot to Grand Pre, only to find its fruitful lands controlled by the same military men who had expelled them years before.

This brave little band continued down the shore of the Bay of Fundy till they came to a fertile stretch through which ran a little stream. Here they settled and called the place Pett Ruisseau (Little Brook). They were soon joined by other Acadians from Canada and the States and now Little Brook is a village extending nearly forty miles along St. Mary's Bay. Among the fifty or so farmers only the original dozen names are represented.

The town has but one street on the sea shore and the houses stretch out for miles on each side of this thoroughfare from which toward the shore are meadows and on the opposite side are pastures and forests.

These homes are cottages of one and two ago.
In the Acadian village of the shore are meadows and on the opposite side are pastures and forests.

These homes are cottages of one and two stories containing from one to four rooms. Some are whitewashed, while others are made waterproof by a covering of fish skin.

Within we see a spinning-wheel and a cookstove which burns only wood. And all the year round the inmates sleep on a feather bed. Castoff clothing is picked into threads which when spun into varn is woven into carnets and so on clothing is picked into threads which when spun into yarn is woven into carpets and so not a thing goes to waste. English is now taught in their schools though they all speak pure French. They are devout worshipers and attend regularly a two hour service in their little whitewashed chapel. Thus:—

"Linger a few Acadian peasants, whose fathers from exile Wandered back to their native land to die in its bosom."

The opening chapters of this intensely interesting story appeared in February Comfort. Back numbers may be obtained by enclosing three cents to Comfort, Augusta, Maine, for each number desired.

During the past year portions of Indian Territory were opened to settlement by the Government allotment of lots by chance, and the scenes that were enacted in the years gone by, when Oklahoma was the objective point of settlers from east and west, north and south, were again presented in a much more exciting manner. A Kanass telephone girl lucki'y secured a lot valued at $17,000, and others were nearly as fortunate.

fortunate.

Because of the exciting events that have transpired in Oklahoma and Indian Territory, events that have altracted the attention of the whole country, the story of "Ned Todd" is presented to our readers in the hope that instruction and entertainment may be derived from its perusal.

CHAPTER XV.

I AM YOUR BROTHER.

RCH Holland had heard the conversation

RCH Holland had heard the conversation recorded in the last chapter, and felt his blood run cold.

"Great heavens!" he gasped, but not loud enough to be heard by the precious pair of scoundrels above. "They are going to murder him almost before my own eyes, and I perfectly powerless to be of any service to him."

service to him."

He would have charged upon them with his gun, had it not been so dark down there, that he could not find his way up. While he, half dazed with dread for the detective, was still debating in his mind what he would do, the man bound hand and foot was thrown over the precipice.

Like a flash a new thought came to his mind. Instantaneously was the plan formed. It was very dangerous, but hazardous as it was, it promised success, and he determined to put it very dangerous, but hazardous as it was, it promised success, and he determined to put it in operation. He placed himself as far out on the edge of the lower ledge of rock as he dared, and the next moment the descending body fell plump into his arms. The fall being several feet, and Ned Todd being no very light weight, Archie was considerably stunned by the shock, and staggered backward until healmost toppled over the bluff himself. As he ran against the loose stone, it fell over and down into the dark torrent below. Archie just recovered himself in time to keep from following it.

Daisy, realizing what had happened, was too much overcome with dread to shriek, or she would have betrayed their presence.

The youth with the detective in his arms sank back upon the ledge of rock.

When Dyke and his companion leaned over the bluff above, and held their torch over trying to penetrate the dark abyss below, all three were out of sight.

"He went right down," said Dyke. "I kin see jist whar ther water closed over him."

"Sunk like lead," put in his companion.

"Bet he did."

"Well I'm glad on't. Guess we're rid o' him now fur good."

"Less go then, fur I didn't like this ere place. I half believe the cave is haunted."

"Less go then, fur I didn't like this ere place. I half believe the cave is haunted." "Come on."

And the two men with their torches turned about and went slowly up the steep path, and soon disappeared from view, leaving a more than midnight darkness behind.

Archie still lay upon the rocks gasping for breath. A sob from the darkness fell upon his ears. He knew who it was.

"Miss Miller," he said.

"Oh, are you there?" she gasped.

"Yes."

"I thought that you had fallen over into the water and was drowned."

"No, it was a loose stone."
"But the detective, Major Todd, he was thrown over into the water, tied hand and foot, thrown over into the water, tied hand and foot, wasn't he?"

"Oh, no, he is right here by my side; but I believe that he has fainted."

"What, by you? How is that? Wasn't he thrown into the water?"

"I cought him. Here, I will strike a match and light a torch, and we can see what we are doing."

doing."
"But they may see it."
"No, they are gone. They have left the cavern."

cavern."
Archie lighted his borch, and saw lying insensible upon the flat stone the detective. Kneeling near him was the pale, beav'iful, Daisy Miller.

"Oh, he is dead, he is dead!" groaned the girl.
"I don't think he is. But he has fainted. Well, if that trial wouldn't make a man faint, it would be because he was not human."
Drawing his knife, he proceeded to cut the cords which bound the detective, and then chafed his limbs. From out one corner of the rock there came a few drops of water, dropping very slowly into a basin, where quite a little pool had been formed. In the hollow of his hand Archie took up some of the cooling water and dashed it into the face of the insensible hand Archie took up some of the cooling water and dashed it into the face of the insensible

In a short time. Ned Todd began to show signs of recovering. Such men seldom faint, but when they do, they recover rapidly. Todd was soon able to sit up, and staring at his young friend and companion in many dangers, swered his companion.

"Let's see, is it all a dream, or was I really thrown over the bluff into the water?"

"It is not a dream. You were thrown over the bluff, but I caught you and kept you from going into the water."

"What? Impossible!"
"No, it is a reality. A solid truth."
"Great guns, what an adventure. Why, it is a thousand wonders that we didn't both go over the bluff." "We came very near doing it."

"We came very near doing it."
"And those rascally road agents?"
"They have gone from the cavern. They don't like it very well. If this cavern could speak, it would a tale unfold whose lightest word would harrow up the soul, I have no doubt."
"I don't care to hear the story, but we might tell our own adventures since we parted."
This they did.

This they did.

The adventures of Archie and Daisy are already known to the reader, and all that the detective had to add was that he had been knocked from his horse, and was taken prisoner by the bandits and brought to this place to be executed. executed.
"Well, if you think it safe for us to venture forth, we will go," he at last concluded.

"Oh, yes, by all means let us go," urged Daisy, who had had enough of the horrible cavern. The lighted torch showed a narrow path up the almost solid stone ascent, leading to the approach of the natural bridge. This they followed, and when they had reached the bridge were so completely exhausted that they were compelled to pause for breath. "This is a strange cavern," said Archie, gazing about the vast chamber in which they were. "When I first found the entrance, I supposed that it had never been entered for a hundred years, at least, but now it is apparent that it has been a sort of prison and rendezvous for the road agents since they have had their organizations in this country."

"This discovery is a most significant one to road agents since they have had their organizations in this country."

"This discovery is a most significant one to me," returned Ned Todd. "I understand many things that have long been a mystery to me. I can realize now how it is possible for the outlaws when hard pressed to disappear from the earth, so that we are not able to find them."

Daisy was so desirous of leaving that they waited only a few moments, and then turned about and started toward the entrance.

Ned Todd having fully recovered from the fearful shock he had sustained, and being in full possession of all his faculties, went before the others. As they came to the narrow passage, where the path wound around among the broken boulders and hewn stone, he suddenly came to a halt, and raising his hand to enjoin silence, gave utterance to a faint warning: "Whist!"

Archie and his fair companion came to a

The sound of approaching footsteps could be d. A moment later and they could even voices.

"Put out the light," whispered Ned Todd, and a moment later they were in total darkness. Then far in front of them there could aleady be seen the faint light from an approaching torch.

Again was the cavern of death to be invaded by some of the infamous band.

"This way," whispered Todd, leading the way along a path which ran under a great projecting ledge of stone, where they all found hiding places behind broken boulders and crevices in the rocks. So near were they, that they could hear every word the two men said as they pessed down the nearest pathwar. The as they passed down the narrow pathway. The voice of one Archie recognized as the man he had heard the evening before.
"Oklahoma Peg knows this secret, if she could be made to tell it, Boydston," said the man who was in front

"Why don't ye make her?" asked Boydston.
"You don't know Peg. She is a regular tigress."

"Well, Captain Snell, I would think that a man who has so successfully managed a band as you have done, would not stand back a single moment on account of a woman."
"If you knew her, Boydston, you wouldn't talk that way. Peg would be burnt at the stake rather than be made to tell anything that she did not want to. She is a regular tigress, she is."

"Well, do you suppose that they have done for Ned Todd, sure enough, this time?" "Of course, didn't you hear Pyke say that he was done for; and that he had been plunged down the bluff into the stream?"

down the bluff into the stream?"

"Oh, yes, but Todd has more lives than c cat. It seems that it makes no difference how far you throw him, he always lights on hip fect."

"When he lights in the water tied hand and foot, so he cannot swim, it doesn't make any difference how he lights. But let's not think any more of him. I want the buried gold."

"What gold?"

"The money that we have for years been trying to find. You know the old cattle king, that had sold his vast herd, and had just got the money when we took him in? Well, he buried his money somewhere and no amount of torture could ever obtain from him where he had cached it. Now I have at last come to the conclusion that he must have buried it somewhere eached it. Now I have at last come to the conclusion that he must have buried it somewhere in this very cavern."

Ned Todd, who was holding one of Archie's pistols in his hand, was about to shoot down the secundrels, and thus rid the earth of two of the worst characters that had ever infested the West; but at marking of the buried treasure. he determined to allow them to live a little longer.

They though him dead, and he could more easily dog their footsteps. If there was a treasure buried he determined to do his part to treasure buried he determined to do his part to find it.

When the two scoundrels went on into the cavern, so fs. that their voices could not be heard, he followed them. Creeping carefully and cautiously along from boulder to boulder, and stone to stone, always near them but always invisible, he managed to be close to them when they halted, and Captain Snell, putting the torch in the hand of Boydston, began digging about under the shelves of rock with his stick.

"I don't intend that any member of the band shall know anything of this treasure, even if I find it," the infamous Captain Snell remarked, as he pursued his investigation.

"Why?"

"Because we can then divide it evenly among portion of it."

The efforts of the two explorers proved futile, and after an hour spent in examining different parts of the cavern, they determined to give it up and leave the place. They went out, leaving our friends crouching among the rocks. Having no idea that Archie and Daisy were taking refuge in the cavern, and believing that Ned Todd had met his fate, they were not at all careful about searching for any one, nor did they seem to try to keep their own designs secret.

"Well, Ned, what shall we do now?" asked the youth.

"Well, Ned, what shall we do now?" asked the youth.
"If I knew the exact course to the boomers' camp, I could tell, but unfortunately I do not. First thing to do, is to get this young lady to some place where she will be safe. Then we will resume the search for your father."
"He is not far from this place, I know, if he lives."

"Why, have you heard from him, or seen him?"
"No but I have seen the man who was re-

"What, do you think that that scoundrel is

"I know it, I have seen him." "I know it, I know it is where, when?"
"In the person of Captain Snell. Captain Snell and Ralph Spencer are one and the same person."

The detective was astounded beyond measure. "I had never dreamed that they were the same person. I supposed that if your half brother had had anything to do with the removal of your father, he had used this Captain Snell as an agent. Why, Captain Snell has been for years one of the most desperate and terrible road agents in the West."
"He has been living a double life then. For terrible road agents in the West."

"He has been living a double life then. For while he was with my father he was only pretending to be an honest cattle herder and the keeper of my poor father's accounts."

"I can see through it all now."

"Well, explain it."

"While he was with your father, pretending to be an honest man, he was in reality only laying his plans to murder him for his money. He waited until he had disposed of all his cattle, and had the money in his possession, and then did his fearful act, whatever it may have been. But one thing is certain, from what we have learned, he did not succeed in finding the money." the money

"I care little for the money if I can only find my father, or at least learn his fate." Ned Todd was of the opinion that the boom-

Ned Todd was of the opinion that the boomers' camp was southwest of them, and they started in that direction.

They were walking along a wooded ravine, when they were suddenly startled by the sharp report of half a dozen rifles. The little party came to a halt, and looked at each other in a puzzled sort of a manner.

"Wait here I must see what that means," the detective whispered and like a flesh be desired.

detective whispered, and like a flash he darted up the hill side, where from the top of the ridge he could have a view of the valley upon the other side.

The valley was covered with grass, with only here and there a standing oak. In the midst of the valley were three men battling for life with half a dozen Indians. They all seemed to be armed with repeating rifles, and were drawing nearer to each other, firing as rapidly as they could. One of the three white men was down, and the other two continued to fight.

A second white fell, and the remaining man turned to fly. Then the air was filled with yells, and the savages started in pursuit. A moment later, and pursuers and pursued had disappeared around the hillock.

"Oh, how I wish I had a dozen border rangers, and all well armed and mounted," said the borderer to himself, as he stood looking after the Indians. "I would swoop down upon those rascals, and sween them from the face of the rascals, and sweep them from the face of the earth."

In the meanwhile how fared it with Archie and Daisy, who had been left alone? They sat down upon the ground, and on glassing at the sun the youth remarked that the day was well night sept.

The firing on the prairie beyond the ridge still continued, and Archie Holland was anxious to know what it meant.

Daisy. "I cannot think of being left alone.
Don't go from me."

"I will not," he said, with his eyes and attention still directed towards the sounds of conflict. "Why don't Ned Todd come back and tell us what it is, and who is fighting?" he asked himself.

"It must be some of the Oklahoma boomers," suggested Daisy.

"I suppose that it is, and it seems to be our duty if such is the case to go to their assistance."

"No, no, Major Todd said for us to stay here," put in Daisy. "He must know what is for the best, and we must obey him."
"I suppose you are correct, Daisy, but I am very anxious to know just what is going on for the best, and we must obey him."

A head, then two, three heads, became visible, and all ornamented with feathers and grotesquely painted. Why don't they turn about and discover their danger?

Slowly one after another of the dark, lithe figures creep from the bushes, one goes toward the girl and the other to the youth. A wild whoop and both are seized almost at the same moment. # CHAPTER XVI.

RESCUED AGAIN.

"Where is she?"

"Where is she?"
Archie's first thought was of Daisy.
"Oh, don't worry yourself about her," said the cynical road agent, who disguised as an Indian walked at the side of his half brother.
"She will be taken care of, and well taken care of at that. I have gone to too much trouble to find her to give her up, or allow her to stray from me." from me. "Ralph Spencer-"

"Ralph Spencer—"

But he was not permitted to finish the sentence. The chief of the road agents sprang at him, and clapped his hand over his mouth, excluding any sound. Bending low, he whispered in the ear of the prisoner:
"Don't as you value your life, whisper that name in the presence of these men again."

Archie was dumbfounded and horrified. He glared at the scoundrel, who walked triumphantly at his side, and said:
"You can boast and exult over me now, but I assure you that you will not long. Major Todd will not be slow in releasing us."

At mention of the name of Todd, their captors all burst into a wild fit of laughter.
"Todd, ha, ha, ha! that's too good. So Todd is all of whom you have any hopes, is he? Well is all of whom you have any hopes, is he? Well let me tell you that Todd is now somewhere under the earth, traveling at the rate of forty miles an hour, if the fishes have not devoured him."

The youth remembering that the road agents still supposed Todd dead, determined not to inform them to the contrary. He closed his lips and refused to talk.

He listened in vain for some sound of Daisy's voice, but heard it not. By craning his neck, however, he saw her carried between two stout Indians.

nowever, he saw her carried between two stout Indians.

In this way they were conveyed about two miles to a cabin. It was a small affair and had evidently years ago been the home of some boomer or hunter. It now bore all the marks of desertion.

The prisoners were taken into it. Small as it was it had two evert ments divided transactions.

was, it had two apartments, divided from each other by a board partition. The boards had evidently been split from the native tree by a former inhabitant.

Daisy was placed in one room and Archie in another.
"Now all of you go out of here, I want totalk

"Now all of you go out of here, I want to talk with this man," said Captain Snell, as we shall continue to call Ralph Spencer.

"Now, Archie Holland, I want to ask you some questions, and if you answer them correctly it will all be well with you, and if you don't, it will not."

"What do you want to ask? Do you want to know if your conduct killed your mother? if so I can answer at once."

"No, I am not going to ask anything about that."

"I should not think you would."
"Hush, until I have framed my question."
"I shall not promise to answer you, if it would assist you in some of your nefarious business."

business."
"Be quiet, will you?"
"I am certain that I do not care to hold any converse with you."
For a moment the road agent chief walked the floor of the small apartment, and then wheeling upon the youthful captive, he asked: "Do you know what your father did with his money?"
"I do not know, nor do I know what became of my father."

of my father.'

"I didn't suppose you did. I am not going to ask you what I know you don't know, but I am going to ask you what you may possibly know. Your father had a large quantity of money before his mysterious disappearance. Did he send it home?"

"I do not know. I think not."

send it home?"
"I do not know. I think not."
"Well, what become of it?"
"I cannot tell. What became of father?"
"Oh, he is dead. Was murdered by the Indians or cowboys."
"I have it from good authority that he is not."

not."
"You have? On what authority, I would like "You remember Frank Erwin, I suppose?"
"You remember Frank Erwin, I suppose?"
"Yes," answered the chief of road agents, starting violently. "What do your know of him?"

"I know that he is dead."

Captain Snell heaved a sigh of relief.
"Well, I was not the cause of his taking off."
"No, he was wounded in a saloon fight in Abilene, and sent for me. I went to him, and he told me that my father was somewhere in Oklahoma a prisoner.
"He did?" shrieked Snell. Then after a few moments' silence he asked in a voice somewhat

Well what more did he tell?"

"Well what more did he tell?"
"Nothing."
"What, not tell you where he was, did not describe the location?"
"All he said was, that it was a log cabin in the wilderness."
"Well, Oklahoma is full of log cabins. If might be any of them or none of them. I have had nothing to do with the mysterious disappearance of your father. The old man and didn't get along very well, it is true; but then I never had any ill will against him. One seldom likes a stepfather, and I didn't. So I ran away from him and never saw him again."
The prisoner fixed his eyes upon the speaker

"Is there no one else for him you would give

"Is there no one else for him you would give your life?"

"Yes. I would give my life to set free the young lady whom you made captive with me."

"Aha, I thought as much," and there was a fleree look in the face of Ralph Spencer as he gave utterance to the remark. "Now let me tell you that there is not gold enough in and out of you that there is not gold enough in and out of Oklahoma to purchase her freedom. You might ask me to give up every limb on my body, but her never. I have captured her for myself."

"Ralph, you have developed into a complete "libin".

villain."

"You are very complimentary, brother, but as Miss Miller is a subject upon which I do not care to talk, I will leave you for the present. Don't be feeding yourself on any such idle fancies as that you are going to get away from us, for we are to look out for that. So goodby until I see you again," and the chief of road agents left Archie sitting on a rude bench that had become coated, doubtless, from long exposure to the weather.

had become coated, doubtless, from long exposure to the weather.

He was tied, so that he could not move without giving himself great pain, and in fact his ankles and wrists were becoming greatly swollen and painful. The sun had gone down, and the shades of night began again to spread a sable mantle over the earth. At first Archie supposed that he was alone, but anon he heard the voice of a sentry at his door conversing with another sentry.

Despite all his anxiety, pain and suffering, however, he found his head nodding and his senses slipping away. He was almost asleep, when two voices talking outside, in an excited manner roused him a moment and he listened

"I was a'most sartin thet I heerd some un in ther wood," said one.

"Ye war asleep, Jake," another replied.
"Don't yer know thet thar's no un this side o' ther river. Them boomers who kim over war every one rubbed out, and we've got this ere feller an' ther gal safe enuff. Ye war jis adreamin', that war all.

"Wall, mebbe I war, but if it war a dream, it war dreamed with my eyes open, that ar' all."

"Go back, and go ter sleep ergin," and the sentry, who had been having some sport at the expense of his comrade in crime, laughed.

Again the youth was nodding, and his consciousness slipping away. This time he was awakened by a soft, gentle voice in the adjoining apartment. It seemed to be pleading, and he raised his head to listen.

"Oh, this cruel cord is cutting my arm; it pains me so that I cannot rest," the voice was saying, "will you not loosen it?"

"Can't do er thing until ther boss comes back," said her cruel guard. "He gin us no orders ter untie yer."

"But just loosen it."

"But just loosen it."
"Can't do it."

"Oh, it is almost killing me. Unloosen it Swar we couldn't do it ef twar ter kill yer."

"Swar we couldn't do it ef twar ter kill yer."
The youth heard her pleading, and the cruel denial of the guard, and was almost furious.
Bound as he was, he struggled to his feet and tried to break the cords that bound him.
"Hulloa, what yer doin' in thar anyway?" called his guard. "Don't yer know that yer can't bust them deer skin thongs?"
"Release her and you may kill me," he cried. "You may bind mine doubly tight."
"Yed better keep a quiet tongue in yer head, ur ye'll git yer jaw broke, we haint er goin' ter stand any nonsense here."
"I am only asking you to have mercy on her."

"Yed better keep a quiet tongue in yer head, ur ye'll git yer jaw broke, we haint er goin' ter stand any nonsense here."

"I am only asking you to have mercy on her."

"We haint er goin' ter hev any mercy on either one o' ye. I'll go in thar and kick her, ef she don't quit that ar' yellin'."

Archie's blood boiled with indignation.

"Coward, ruffian," he hissed through his clenched teeth, and made herculean efforts to break the deer skin thongs which bound him.

"See hyar yer doin' er leetle too much. Yer jist er carryin' that er thing er bit too fur," cried one of the guards, running at him.

At this moment there was heard a rush of footsteps without. There came the blinding flash, the deafening report of a pistol, and the fail of a body. The guard wheeled about, snatching a weap'n from his belt.

"Hold thar, what d'ye mean?"

But he was too late. A dark form sprang in the door, and at the same instant that it appeared, there was another blinding flash.

The sharp report of a second pistol shot broke on the air followed a second later by a third. The guard went down, and the man who had just sprang into the door staggered.

So sudden and unexpected had been the attack, that Archie hardly realized what was going on until he saw Ned Todd leap in at the door, a smoking revolver in his hand.

"You are just in time, Ned, I believe that I would have died had you not come to my rescue."

"Hush, there is not a moment to lose. We will have them on us in less than ten minutes, thick as the leaves of the forest."

"Don't forget Daisy."

"Have you gone to her rescue yet?"

"Have you gone to her rescue yet?"

"Have not, but I will. There, you are free,

"Have you gone to her rescue yet?"

"I have not, but I will. There, you are free, get up and go." Archie struggled to his feet, but so benumbed were his ankles that at first he could not stand. At last however, after rubbing them for a few moments, he was able to hobble a little.

In the meanwhile Ned Todd had gone and liberated the captive maiden, and came back "Come on, we have not a single second to spare. They are coming."

As Archie Holland sprang from the hut he heard the sound of voices and hurried tramp of feet coming toward them.

"There they are, come on," cried Ned Todd, springing into the thicket with Daisy Miller in his arms. Archie Holland followed him as rapidly as possible in his feeble condition. ERCY!" exclaimed Miss Betsey, with a shudder, as the report of a cannon made the window sash rattle above her head.

The rumble and roar of the report had hardly died away in the darkness of the night when another report followed, loud-again in her rocking chair by the window. From underneath a bed in one corner of the room there came a long-drawn-out and dismal howl.

"I really believe they'll scare that cat into dismal howl.

"I really believe they'll scare that cat into fits;" the woman said."

"Poor thing!" she added, a moment later, as the rattle of half a dozen bunches of fire crackers set off at one time came in from the street. "To think that a set of tykes like them can't find any better way of celebrating the Fourth of July than to make night hideous.

"I daresn't go to bed," she went on, a little later, as the red light of a bonfire began to shine through the closed blinds of the window, "even if I could go to sleep—which I couldn't for fear they'll set the house on fire. And I just can't shut all these windows down, for it's so hot I'll suffocate if I do."

She pushed open the blind slats a little and looked out between them. At the far end of the village square the boys had built a bonfire of tar barrels. The front of the buildings near Miss Betsey's house stood out from the darkness and the plate glass windows in a business block next door reflected the red glare of the firelight.

block next door reflected the red glare of the firelight.

While the woman was still peering through the blinds, a man came hastily out of one of the buildings carrying a satchel in one hand, while he stood for an instant in front of the door, as if debating in his mind which way to go. The uproar at the opposite end of the village swelled to a louder chorus, and new fuel flung on to the fire made the red light brighter still.

At the sight of this the man turned abruptly from where he stood, and coming quickly to the edge of the sidewalk, dropped the bag which he held over the fence into Miss Betsey's which he held over the fence into Miss Betsey's garden, and then hastened back to the building.

"Well, now! Did you ever?" said the owner of the garden, as she drew back from the window. "That was that good-for-nothing fellow in the drug store, I believe. I suppose that bag is full of his nasty torpedoes and fire crackers, and such things, and that he's gone back to get some more. If it wasn't for breaking every pane of glass in this house, I could wish the whole lot had gone off when he dropped the bag over the fence. I wish somebody'd see the the bag and steal it;" she went on. "It would serve him just right."

To the roar of cannon and crackers and

To the roar of cannon and crackers and voices there was now added the clang of the violently rung bell in the steeple of one of the churches.

The cat under the bed yawled again.
"I'll steal it myself," said Miss Betsey, rising from the rocking chair with tightly shut lips.
The woman let herself out of the house by a side door. One corner of the garden was in the shadow of the two-story brick block which adjoined it, and she was easily hidden by the trees beneath which she walked. Seizing the bag she carried it away from the street; it was heavier than she had expected. When she had reached a place where she thought no one could see her, Miss Betsey opened the bag and looked in. In the dim light which reached her there she could see that the satchel was filled to the clasps with paper covered rolls.

been developed there, and in ten years the quiet village had changed to a prosperous, busy town, whose business blocks replaced and crowded the staid residences which had preceded them. Miss Betsey had money enough to do as she chose, and she chose to retain and live in the house which had been her girlhood home, in spite of the fact that the lot on which it stood was coveted by half a dozen business firms, and that the house itself was elbowed on one side by a drug store and bank, and on the firms, and that the house itself was elbowed on one side by a drug store and bank, and on the other by the county court house.

For family she had, besides a servant and cat, only a niece. This young woman, Gertrude Ford, was such a pretty and attractive girl that it was no wonder to those who knew her that the druggist next door should have fallen in love with her. Miss Betsey, however, for some inscrutable reason, had taken a violent dislike to the young merchant, had delent dislike to the young merchant, had de-nounced him as a fortune hunter, and had forbidden her niece to have him come near the house. As a matter of course the two young people met all the more often somewhere else, and it was they whom Miss Betsey had encountered at the side door amid the disturbance of a

CONSUMPTION COMBATANTS

That Intercept and Route the Actual Malady.

FREE POTENT PREVENTIVES AND CURATIVES OF BRONCHIAL, LUNG AND OTHER TISSUE-WASTING MALADIES.

The universal free distribution during the past decade, by Dr. T. A. Slocum, the great New York physician and bacteriologist, of his famous four remedies has demonstrated the possibility of preventing the invasion of and mastering consumption and other diseases of wasting tendencies.

While other physicians have been theorizing, Dr. Slocum has made practical application of his scientific knowledge by sending free to threatened and actual subjects of consumption, catarrh, bronchitis, etc., the perfect products of his immense pharmaceutical laboratories—evolved by him with the definite purpose of arresting the widespread ravages of the greatest foe of the human race—tuberculosis. Thousands of tuberculous and tuber-culosis-threatened people have written to the Doctor and obtained his four free diseasecombatants, the use of which to-day accounts for their escape and freedom from grave pulmonary and other ills that otherwise would have deprived them of their lives

The great free trial offer of all four famous disease-combative preparations, by Dr. Slo-cum, is now open to all who find themselves in the grasp of tuberculosis, and to all in whose cases attack from consumption or other wasting malady seems to be impending.

Address all communications to Those who procure these four free remedies are prepared to forestall the deadly bacillus, to combat it successfully after its actual invasion of the body, to nourish their systems when food digestion becomes impaired, to remedy cough and lighten respiration, to secure the best possible tonic effects, to obtain cure of local catarrhal conditions, and to elude or escape from consumption and other lifedestroying maladies.

As a prohibitive and curative armament for the fortification of the body and its relief from insidious, tissue-consuming ills, the above free combination is positively unmatched.

The Emulsion, Psychine Tonic, Coltsfoote Expectorant and Ozojell Catarrh Remedy are alone in their respective classes and are potent examples of the pharmaceutical art.

Those who need but one or two of the remedies are at liberty to write for the com-plete combination, and to give to friends, menaced or afflicted, those of the preparations not needed in their own cases.

Write to Dr. T. A. Slocum, plainly giving post office and express address, and the four free remedies will at once be sent to you with full directions for use in any case.

Then came the sensation.

When business would have been resumed on the morning of the fifth, it was discovered that sometime during one of the two nights, or during the holiday itself the bank had been burglarized and all the valuable contents of the safe taken, papers, bills, and gold and silver coin put up in rolls.

Miss Betsey passed a most uncomfortable day. Not only was she a heavy holder of the stock of the bank, but at the time of the robbery she had had some thousands of dollars on "That druggist is the thief," she kept saying to herself, "but I'm just as much of a thief as he is. And I'd die of mortificationn to have folks know I flung my own money into the Toward nightfall that day Gertrude saw her aunt looking down into the old well in the garden. The older woman's discomfort could not but be noticeable all through the day.

"Are you sick, today, Aunt Betsey?" the girl asked with honest sympathy, for in spite of her aunt's peculiarities, Gertrude recognized the real goodness of heart which was underneath them.

"No, I ain't," Miss Betsey replied fretfully, turning away from the well, and then going on to say, as if in a sudden fit of desperation, "but I'm clean tired out and worried to death with the racket of the last forty-eight hours, and with finding you out at midnight trapsing

"I thought so," she said. "Fire crackers! what they call giant ones, I suppose! I'll giant 'em!"

Snapping the bag together she took it from the ground again, and walking unhesitatingly to an old well at the far end of the garden, dropped it into the well. She listened for the "splash," far down below the time-worn curb. When she heard it she straightened up again.

"I'll see if he'll fire them off under my nose, now;" she said, and went back to the house. Stepping quickly and silently upon the porch at the side door, she ran plump into a young man and woman standing there.

"Why, Aunt Betsey!" said the girl, as the three started back from each other. "What in the world are you doing out at this time of night?"

The older woman bent forward in the darkness, as if to make sure who the others were.

"None of your business," she said, as she drew back from them to go into the house. "Why ain't you abed?"

Miss Betsey Prillerman was the representative in Brinsmeadow of what was spoken of as "one of the old families of the town." For years Brinsmeadow has been a quiet, well-to-do country village. Then a water power had been developed there, and in ten years the quiet village had changed to a prosperous, busy town, whose business blocks replaced and crowded the staid residences which had pre-down and in the park the state of the last forty-eight hours, and the finding you out at midnight trapsing around, as pour out businest from the racket of the last forty-eight hours, and the finding you out at midnight trapsing 'round with a thief and a robber."

"Aunt Betsey! Stop!" The girl's eyes blazed and her mouth shut together as firmly as ever her relative's could have done.

"I was not 'trapsing around,' as you call it. I had just come from Mrs. Eldred's, where we had been watching the fireworks. And Mr. Will not hear you say it."

"He is," said Miss Betsey bring a bag out of the bank had hen only and in the dark ness, as if to make sure w

After the disturbance and excitement of the two preceding days and nights the people of Brinsmeadow went to bed early that night. If they had not, some of them might have seen in the dusk of the evening a group of two persons—a woman and a man—gathered around the old well in Betsey Prillerman's garden.

The man was industriously fishing in the well with a big pair of grapples heavily weighted at the end of a long, stout line.

satchel.

The next morning the town had another sensation. The bank's missing property was found returned as mysteriously as it had been taken, but wet and sodden in a leather valise. The specie was all right, of course. The bills required the help of the Treasury Department to redeem. The papers were spoiled, but the most of them could be repaired.

In the confusion of talk and speculation which followed, folks never noticed—what otherwise would have been a nine-days' wonder—that Betsey Prillerman had suddenly become reconciled to the attentions of druggist Raymond to her niece.

Summer Girl Gowns.

How To Dress a Summer Girl of from Twelve to Fifteen Years Becomingly And Inexpensively.

A most charming dress for a young girl is of Persian lawn, although any of the beautiful sheer materials now displayed in the shop windows may be chosen. The waist is tucked to form a yoke in clusters of fine tucks and lace inserting between each cluster. The skirt is a straight one of three or four widths according to the size of the girl, and tucked in small tucks from the waist half way to the knee. Arrange inserting as in the waist between the cluster of tucks. Two ruffles edged with lace finish the bottom of the skirt, the elbow sleeves are tucked and finished with a wide frill, trimmed with lace and inserting. A belt of rose or blue velvet ribbon is worn at the waist also heads the frill of the sleeves and finishes with a bow. The high collar is touched with the velvet and a bow ornaments the hair.

collar is touched with the velvet and a bow ornaments the hair.

Pink organdy: This will be effective in a simple inexpensive gown. The entire waist is tucked—the sleeves the same (elbow sleeves if preferred) and finished with five tiny ruffles. Nine small ruffles give the finishing touch to the gored skirt. The neck is cut square and trimmed with tiny ruffles. In making this dress the goods is first tucked and then cut out.

trimmed with tiny ruffles. In making this dress the goods is first tucked and then cut out.

Green mercerized ginham: This goods with its sliky effect, make a charming girl's dress at a small expenditure. The gored skirt is made with three graduating flounces. Standing at the head of each is a dainty little ruffle. The waist is cut in the novel Gibson style with six narrow ruffles running from the neck to the belt forming a vest, in harmony with the most extreme fashionable taste of the present period of fluffiness. The sleeves are gathered into deep cuffs and the waist buttoned in the back with small black buttons and the waist band is a tie of black velvet ribbon, one half inch wide. High collar may be worn with this, with a small turnover embroidered in black silk.

Blue lawn of one of the fashionable shades. The skirt is gored and the wide flounce at the bottom is tucked one-third its depth and trimmed with three rows of narrow blue velvet ribbon, the same shade of the lawn. The sleeves are tucked to the elbow, forming a graceful hanging sleeve caught at the wrist by a narrow band trimmed with the velvet. The waist is plain, with a large sailor collar with deep points crossing in the front and fastened to the belt at each side with bows of the velvet ribbon. This collar is finished with three rows of velvet. The high collar of latticed velvet and belt completes this very smart costume.

Any one of these simple and pretty gowns is worn with a large white hat and white gloves. Every summer season brings its new and inexhaustible supplies of soft, gauzy materials, in which the girl of any size can be gowned, not extravagantly but most becomingly and attractively, and all can be produced at home. To complete this wardrobe add the grey or tan linen skirt. White pique and dark blue duck skirts with circular flounce, are to be worn with shirt waists of percale and India linen.

Pedigree Yeasts.

HE brewers both in this country and abroad are quite generally adopting the use of so-called pedigree yeasts—that is to say, yeasts derived by propagation from known varieties of ferment-producing fungi. fungi

Until recently brewers were accustomed to rely upon yeast which they kept in stock, but, though the utmost care was taken to conserve its purity, it was always apt to be spoiled by the intrusion of "wild" and undesirable fungi, the spores of which float about in the air. Inas-intrusion of "wild" and undesirable fungi, the spores of which float about in the air. Inasmuch as beer depends chiefly upon yeast for its flavor and quality, and each variety produces its own peculiar taste in the beverage, accidents of the sort described constantly happened, and not even the most painstaking manufacturer could count upon uniformity in his output.

At length, however, two Scandinavian experts started in to breed yeasts, beginning with single cells so as to be sure to avoid any mixture. By experiment they found what species produced the best-flavored beer, and two of these, known as "Carlsberg Unterhefe No. 1 and No. 2," are now used in breweries all over the civilized world. They are pure cultures of known kinds of fungi, grown in beerwort, and and No. 2," are now used in breweries an over the civilized world. They are pure cultures of known kinds of fungi, grown in beerwort, and are sold in hermetically-sealed bottles.

A Chicago firm is likewise breeding and selling pure cultures of first-class yeasts, which the brewers buy and utilize in place of the old-fashioned stock yeasts. Employing these preparations, which are guaranteed virgin, they know exactly how a brew is going to turn out, whereas formerly it was a sort of gamble. The beerwort is made by steeping the powdered malt (barley), kernels in water at a certain temperature until the starch of grain has been converted into sugar, whereupon the stuff is sterilized by heat and inoculated with a few germs of the species required. Quickly they multiply throughout the substance, which thus becomes a culture of the yeast.

Bacteria of various objectionable kinds have a way of getting into beer, to the serious injury of the beverage. A while ago a man named Effront, in Germany, discovered that such germs would not grow in the presence of fluorid of sodium, a very small quantity of which he put into the vats. It seemed to work beautifully, but the government sat down nard upon the inventor, because the law in that country says that nothing but water, hops, malt and yeast shall be used in the making of beer. Then Effront rented a field of barley and watered it with the fluorid solution, enough of which was found to be contained in the reaped grain to serve his purpose. the reaped grain to serve his purpose.

This persuaded the government to withdraw its prohibtion, but Effront's process was abandoned later, because it was found that the fluorid, while interfering somewhat with the propagation of the good yeast, offered less opposition to wild fungi that might intrude, thus giving encouragement to the latter.

A formula that will darken them and will make them grow is composed of two ounces of red vaseline, one eighth ounce tincture cantarides, and fifteen drops each of oil of rosemary and oil of lavender. Apply once a day with a soft tooth brush until they show an improvement, and then less often. This is good for the eyelashes also, but be very careful in applying it as it will inflame the lids.

Somebody's Darling, Nevada, Iowa—Etiquette is not considered by the men who propose to their lady loves, as far as any work on etiquette records manners. The man can do exactly as he pleases, and may make his proposals on his knees or in any other way which seems proper to him. Usually the young woman is not very critical. COMFORTS AT HOME LAWYER

For the enlightenment and benefit of its subscribers, COMFORT has inaugurated this department under the title of COMFORT'S AT-HOME LAWYER, wherein will be carefully and correctly solved any legal problem which may be submitted. All opinions given herein, will be prepared at our expense by eminent counsel.

Law suits can frequently be avoided by timely and judicious advice concerning matters in dispute; this, however,
can only be done by one who is fully conversant with his or her legal rights and privileges. This department will also prove of great value and interest from an educational standmonth, as in it will be answered any proper legal question that may be propounded.

Inasmuch as it is one of the principal missions of COMFORT to aid in upbuilding and upholding the sanctity of the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to divorce.

the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to divorce.

Any yearly subscriber to COMFORT fully paid in advance is veicome to submit inquiries, which, so far as possible, will be answered in this department. If any reader, other than a subscriber, wishes to take advantage of this privilege, it may be done by sending twenty-five (25) cents, in silver or stamps, for an annual subscription to COMFORT thus obtaining all the benefits which our subscribers enjoy including a copy of the magasine for one year.

Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any legal question, privately mated, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing the same to "THE EDITOR, COMFORT'S AT-HOME LAWYER," Augusta, Maine, and in reply a carefully prepared opinion will be sent in an early mail. Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons seeking advice in this column but not necessarily for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

M. T. B. Your letter presents some technical question of law which need to be carefully investigated. You wil find it fully answered in the August number of Comfort.

M. E. If you will read the introduction to the "Comfort.
At Home Lawyer Column" you will find that it is not our policy to give advice with reference to divorce matters.
It is the purpose of Comfort to build up rather than to destroy the home, and we therefore must reluctantly refuse to give you any information pertaining to methods of obtaining a divorce.

of obtaining a divorce.

C. E. B.—The Bankrupt Law provides that any person can be discharged from the indebtedness which such person contracted, in a business way, no matter how long since contracted. The fact that the original creditor is dead and that the debt is now due to his heirs would not debar the debtor from taking advantage of the Bankrupt Act. In what you call, "The Story of the Case," you give the debtor's assets as fifty dollars and his liabilities as twenty-eight thousand dollars. Under these circumstances it would seem as though you were wasting time to endeavor to collect the money.

J. W.—In order to bring su't to recover damages for the killing of your brother at Stonington, Maine, it will be necessary for you to have an administrator appointed over your deceased brother's estate for the purpose of bringing this suit. Such administrator will have to be appointed by the court which jurisdiction over such matters at the place where your brother, in his lifetime, lived. If he lived in Brooklyn you should go to the Surrogate's Court there, and take such action as is herein advised and the administrator can then begin action to recover damages against the Co. which may be responsible for the accident which caused his death.

S. K. S.—What the father might do to punish the son if sponsible for the accident which caused his death.

S. K. S.—What the father might do to punish the son if he called on his mother contrary to the father's wishes is a question which the editor of this column can hardly answer. There is really only one thing to do in a case of this kind and that is the following: Under the law a minor child who has arrived at the age of fourteen has a right to choose his own guardian. In the case you put, the boy can choose either his father or his mother or any other person whom he cares to thus honor. To do this, he must petition the court having jurisdiction of such matters, to have the guardian appointed; he will then be permitted to visit whomsoever he pleases, provided such visits are made with the approbation of his guardian.

S.—It you have suffered any loss or damage by reason visits are made with the approbation of his guardian.

S.—If you have suffered any loss or damage by reason of the failure of the other party to adhere to the terms of the contract, a copy of which you submit, you can enter suit in the courts of your county and recover such damages as you can prove that you sustained by reason of the other party's failure to live up to the contract. As a rule it is a difficult matter to recover damages by reason of a breach of contract to ship goods. Inasmuch as the question of loss of profit thereon is purely speculative, it does not follow but what you might have made a loss on the goods, had shipment been made. In the event, however, that you can prove actual damage you have clearly a cause of action, and can recover all the loss which you sustained because of the failure of the other party to adhere to his contract.

E. L. S. It is not necessary as a matter of law, that the which you sustained because of the failure of the other party to adhere to his contract.

E. L. S. It is not necessary as a matter of law, that the author of any poem, song, or musical composition should have his production copyrighted. The chances are that any one who would buy the manuscript of an original production of this kind would have it copyrighted, as in case such action were not taken the same could be copied or reproduced by any one who would care to do so. The cost of an ordinary copyright is fifty cents and the time which it takes to get it is simply the length of time that it takes for the mail to reach from the place of mailing the application to Washington. If you will write to the Hon. Thorvald Solberg, Register of Copyrights, Washington, D. C., he will, on request, send you full instructions, telling you how to proceed to obtain a copyright.

Mrs. E. A. P. The method of opening an account in a National Bank is as follows: You must go to the bank with some person who is known there and who will introduce you to one of the officers thereof. Thereupon you will be asked to sign a book or card for the purpose of leaving your signature. You will then make out a little ticket known as a "deposit slip," whereon you will write the amount of money you wish to deposit. This deposit slip, together with the amount of money for deposit, is taken to the receiving teller of the bank who will give you a book upon which your name will be plainly written and the deposit you make, as well as all subsequent deposits, will be recorded in this book. You will also receive a check book for your use in drawing such funds as from time to time you may wish to withdraw. The officer of the bank will instruct you how to make out the checks.

DAVINS

| Sepavin can be cured in bones, Curbs and Spilets of painful and never has information about this informa

Old Man, Roncevalles, W. Va.—For sprains of the muscles of the back make a mixture of half ounce of Canada turpentine, soap liniment six ounces and one drachm of laudanum. Rub well in before a hot fire, and give yourself a rest. You cannot expect your back to get well land strong if you do not give it a chance.

Ball Player, Anderson, Ind.—Wormwood boiled in vinegar and applied hot, with enough cloths wrapped around the ankle to keep the part moist, will be found a most excellent remedy for a sprain. Don't put your weight on it until it can be done without pain, and be very careful how you walk. A sprain is sometimes more serious than a fracture.

S. K. D., Sheridan, Wis.—A simple remedy that has cured many of the barber's itch is to moisten the part affected with saliva (spittle) and rub it over thoroughly three times a day with the ashes of a good Havana cigar. This simple remedy has been very highly recommended.

Mrs D. McD., Pittsville, Pa.—An excellent remedy to have in the house for burns and scalds is a preparation of flaxseed oil, chalk and vinegar mixed to the consistency of thick paint. Keep it in a closed jar. It will be ready for use when needed and may be applied as the case requires.

needed and may be applied as the case requires.

Hiram J., Wausa, Nev.—If your rheumatism is no more serious than you say, you may find relief from it, since you do not wish to go to any expense, by bathing the part affected with water in which potatoes have been boiled, as hot as can be borne, just before going to bed. Some quite obstinate cases have been practically cured, that is relieved so they were no longer troublesome, by this remedy and you may find it to be just what you want.

Painter, Auburn, N. H.—Do not wash your hands in turpentine to get the paint off, as, if the practice is persisted in, it may lead to serious results even to paralysis of the wrist joints. It also has a tendency to enlarge the finger joints, renders the hands more sensitive to cold and lays the foundation of rheumatism.

tion of rheumatism.

Miss G. H. O. R. Modesto, Ills.—Yes, blood root syrup is good for colds and bronchial troubles with difficult breathing. It may be made as follows: Two and a half ounces of blood root, threelows: Two and a half ounces of blood root, threefourths of an ounce of lobelia, one and a half ounces of white sugar, and a pint and a half of water. Gently simmer half an hour till it thickens and when cool add a teaspoonful of paregoric elixir. Take a tablespoonful when needed. Give a child a teaspoonful or less. Any druggist will compound the mixture for you.

Mather Highland, Kans.—Do not worry about

Mother, Highland, Kans.—Do not worry about the little girl with the mumps which you think may result seriously. Nurse her carefully, keep flannel around her neck, give her a mild diet of the simplest food, and administer gentle laxatives at intervals. She will be sure to come around all right and have many more serious afflictions than even a persistent case of mumps.

Miss Choir, Afton, N. J.—To remove the hoarseness that troubles you put into an ounce of alcohol twenty drops of saturated solution of iodine, and put five drops of the mixture on a lump of sugar, and let it dissolve in the mouth every two hours, until relieved.

G. G. H. Westlake, Minn.—It is not unusual for quinine to affect some people as you complain of its doing. Try antikamnia.

King, Chase, Md.—Consult a physician. You should have done so three months ago. You are in no danger, but will be if you let it continue.

Mrs. John V. Bridgeton, Ind.—Some patent medicines are excellent remedies despite what some physicians may say to the contrary.

n order that each cousin may be answered this column, no cousin must ask more than ree questions in one month.

A July greeting to you all, dear cousins, which, of course, is a warm one, but greetings are not like the weather, and I am sure you do not care how warmly I greet you. Do you? It is not nice to work in hot weather, but we are not always our own choosers, so let us get at it not always our own choosers, so let us get at it cheerfully.

The first one in the list is from Cousin Beatrice Bergstressor, Bolivar, Mo., who wants to accomodate those cousins who are musically inclined but who can't get words for the music they write. I know how hard it is to do this kind of work and if Cousin Beatrice is willing to help by doing so, she certainly should be encouraged.

Mary McCormick, III.—To the men who talk affectionately and want to flatter you, the very best way to do is to answer them in the same way—that is, don't mean half you say. As soon as the men see you have good common sense they will treat you accordingly. (2.) Do not love the young man until he tells you he loves you. Let him make all the advances and don't show him your feelings until he has shown his.

Sweetheart, Manhattan, Kans.—The young man until he has shown his.

Sweetheart, Manhattan, Kans.—The young man should have only one sweetheart. (2) Cousins should not "keep company." (3) A girl may have as many men paying her attention as she can, but she must not firt with them ordeceive them as to her feelings. (4) If the man has no other vices save being "ungodly" he might be reformed by marrying a good, Christian woman. Some men, who are not professing Christians, make excellent husbands. husbands.

You & I, Arbuckle, Cal.—If your prejudices against the Catholic church are very strong you had better not marry a Catholic. (2) Say "yes" to the man who proposes to you, if you want him; and "no" if you do not. The manner of saying it, I leave to you. (3) Yes.

Foster, Evening Shade, Ark.—If your parents object to your corresponding with a young man, do not do it. (2) A wedding dress for a bride of seventeen does not differ from those of brides of more suitable age. (3) Wait until he tells her he loves her.

Black Eyes, Agra, Kans.—Ask the man for his arm if you want to take it.

Donna, Fidelity, Ohio.—The young man should not play escort to one young lady when he is devoting himself to another. (2) There is no rule for calls for young men. Oftener than once a week usually means that he is serious in his attentions. (3) No. (4) Pretty names for a girl baby are: Ruth, Charlotte, Judith, Bruce, Edith, Elsa, Viola, Fairfax, Page, Beatrice.

Worried, Charleston, S. C.—Before trying to become a correspondent get something to do for one of the Charleston papers. Write something and submit it to the editor. Penmanship has nothing to do with becoming a correspondent, as most writing is done these days on the typewriter.

which will surely come if you do not get also aged.

Blue Eyes, Kilkenny, Minn.—Twenty is much better age than seventeen for an engagement. (2) No, no, no. (3) If the man neglects you that way when he has escorted you to a dance, simply tell him you do not like it and that you will not give him the opportunity to treat you so again—and don't. (4) He may call as often as you wish, and 10.30 is a good leaving time. (5) Yes. (6) Usually when a brother or other near relative is your escort to a dance you are allowed to "go with" more "others" than if your escort was not a kinsman. (6) Let him go.

(6) Let him go.

Wild Cherry, Florence, Pa.—Tell the man that your parents object to your seeing him and that you think they are quite right. If he is a decent man he will commend your action.

Bright Eyes, Hay Creek, Ore.—Fourteen year old girls should wait till they are twenty before they ask the questions you do, my dear, and then they would not ask them. Wait and see for yourself, if I am not right. I am not right.

Daisy, Clover, Utah.—By all means refuse to go with the man who has been drinking. Surely you can better look out for yourself than for such a man to try to do it. All your other questions have been answered in this column.

Sweet Flower, Mt. Vernon, Ill.—I can not tell you how to get him back and I would not if I could. You did right in sending him away and why should you want to shame yourself by trying to get him back? (2) If you do not love the man your mother likes do not marry him. There is plenty of time; wait three or four years and see what changes will come.

Harry. Ottawa, Kan.—If you are so large, you could wear your dresses longer than a small girl of fifteen. (2) I suppose there is no harm in letting one of your schoolmates walk home with you, but not a young man who is out of school. That kind of attention is for girls who are done with school.

Union, New Dover, Ohio.—It is your place to speak about it, and you should do so at once.

K. I. B., Donnells, Iowa.—The only cure for bashfulness is constant association with people. In time you will be easy and if you will read and improve your mind you will attract people to you. Miss L. P., Colchester, Ills.—Oregon is one of the finest states in the Union in many respects, and it has wide diversities of soil and climate. West of the Cascade Range of mountains, the climate is very damp. The rainfall is not greater than in Illinois, for the year, but it requires more days to get it. For that reason the state along the coast is not good for asthmatic people. It very rarely freezes in that section and is never hot in summer. It is not good for raising crops except in a small way. East of the mountains, however, the climate is entirely different, extremes of heat and cold being common, but not more so than in your own state, though possibly some colder in winter. Here grow tremendous crops of wheat, and the apples are the finest, many of them being as large as a cocoanut. We have seen Oregon apples five inches in diameter, and of fine flavor, notwith-standing their size. Pears and plums also grow to enormous size, and grapes are equally as fine. All the vegetables thrive wonderfully, and enormous crops of prunes are raised. Irrigation is necessary in some sections for the other crops than grain. The health records of the state show it to be one of the health est. There are thirty millions of acres of tillable land in Oregon, not more than a tenth of which is under cultivation. Portland is one of the richest cities, per capita, in the world, and it is growing rapidly. The Oregonian is the leading paper. A request to the Oregon Railroad and Navigation Co., Portland, will bring you its book by Col. P. Donan, on Oregon, Washington and Idaho, which will give you all the details you need before a personal inspection.

Mrs. A. L. S., Elsie, Mich.—We could not recommend the Hawaiian Islands for the raising of chickens and squabs. You must have a larger market than can be found there. They could be raised, of course, for the climate and the food supply would be found all that you wished, but there is no sent to you. The postage of letters to Honolulu is the same as in the United States.

R. D., Niangua, Mo.—You might do well by moving to Arkansas and you might not. There is no doubt about its being a great state agriculturally, and in some lines it is second to none, but if you are not able to make money in Missouri, you would be better off in Arkansas unless you happened to hit upon something special. If you have enough money to give yourself a start in Arkansas you might do better than where you are. You do not say in what business you are or whether you want to live in town or in the country, so we cannot advise you definitely. If you will be a little more definite in your questions we can tell better what to reply. The Public School system is quite as good as that of Missouri, we imagine, and back from the lowlands along the rivers, the health is as good as it is in your own state. Parts of Arkansas are malarial, but the newcomer can easily keep away from these sections.

E. S., Muskingum, Ohio—A circular of Virgina away from these sections.

E. S., Muskingum, Ohio—A circular of Virginia lands will be sent to you with prices of farms. Or you may write to H. W. Weiss, Manager of Immigration, Emporia, Va.

D. H.J., Clinton, Iowa.—Lands on Long Island are to be had, but the Island is becoming practically a suburb of New York City, and prices are high, except in undesirable localities. Yes, there are musquitoes. There is no point on the Island five hundred feet above sea level.

Mrs. K. R., Montville, Conn.—You can buy a Blue are musquitoes. There is no point on the Island five hundred feet above sea level.

Mrs. K. R., Montville, Conn.—You can buy a Blue Grass farm in Kentucky at from $75 an acre up to any price you want to pay. The climate is good.

H. I. H., Wooster, Ohio.—Real estate in New York City is at fancy prices in good localities, and not cheap anywhere. Money is made in real estate in that city only by those who have large amounts to expend. One man there recently paid $375,000 for a small plot of about 1,200 square feet on Broadway, and he has rented the forty thousand dollar building he put on it for $40,000 a year for twenty years.

Mechanic, Wilkesbarre, Pa.—If you are really a good blacksmith we would advise your moving to a town of from fifteen hundred to three thousand people in an agricultural section. There are numerous such towns in your own state, and they may be found in any southern state, where an upto-date white mechanic, with energy and promptness in doing his work, would be sure to do well.

Harkins, Plainfield, N. J.—A good laundryman

ness in doing his work, would be sure to do well.

Harkins, Plainfield, N. J.—A good laundryman in a southern town would be a success if he brought the latest methods of laundering with him, and had active people in his employ. We know of several who have done extremely well simply because they got away from the old-fash ioned style and slow delivery, and did their work in city fashion, with enough energy to gather in the business of neighboring towns. A visit through Kentucky, Tennessee and Georgia would open your eyes to the possibilities, but you would have to see for yourself.

Mrs. J. H. G., Ellsworth, Kans.—If you have your eyes the possionities, but you would have money enough to pay $5,000 for a home do not buy it in one of the larger cities. For that amount you can not get much of a place, and your income will not enable you to have any social advantages. You might get a good place in a suburb, but we fancy you would in a town of similar size that was independent of the city. Select a town of from three to seven thousand population in a long settled community, say three hours from a city. Either the East or West would answer, but your property would increase in value.

We are in receipt of a number of letters addressed to inquirers which we are unable to forward as we keep no record of these names, and inquirers as a rule do not wish their full names given. If those who do will so inform us we will give their addresses in full for the benefit of any who may wish to apply to them directly.

A GIFT OF EMBROIDERY SILK.

Embroidery silk will cost you a lot of money bought at the store. We have a great jobbing-house lot of rich silk bought at wholesale. No high retail price with a lot of middle profits; but we get actual cost price. We want to give the whole benefit to our lady readers. We have prepared a lot of assorted packages containing a liberal supply of bright, rich, new silk in a variety of tones and shades, which would cost a heap of money bought at the stores. We will send our illustrated bargain list and full assorted, large sized silk package for the ridiculously low price of ten cents; or, for the ridiculously low price of ten cents; or, three packages for twenty cents. Write to-day before the rush. S. W. LANE & Co., Augusta, in general is laworable for the prospect, action.

CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

Mars and Venus conjoined with the 8th and ruling the 5th house jointly, indicates a bad shipwreck in the western waters or a bad disaster from some flood, also an unusual number of accidents to pleasure seekers upon or in the water. Let all engaged in public sports see that no accidents happen through carelessness. The 8th so fully occupied and affected cautions against careless use of steam and explosives, for avoidance of sudden death, especially among men of wealth.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR AUGUST, 1902.

AUGUST 1-Friday. Push all matters vigorously during this day, giving preference, if any, to transactions pertaining to the elegant avocations and the polite arts; prosecute mathematical and musical studies and pursuits; the latter part of the forenoon advises moderation and deliberation rather than haste in any important affair and recommends self-control and the avoidance of quarrels or controversies.

2-Saturday. Use the early part of the day for the most important moves, for as the noon passes, baffling and disappointing conditions arise which promise very unfavorably for the launching of any new undertaking or the progress of matters already in hand; be sure not to sign any writings pertaining to business or lands.

3-Sunday. The forenoon is the best part of the of fir all kinds of religious exercises. The afternoon detrimental to church interests.

4-Monday. A favorable day generally, provided caution is observed during the afternoon against rashness and contention; do not enter into any matrimonial engagement during the afternoon and evening nor expect much satisfaction from musical or artistic efforts.

pect much satisfaction from musical or artistic efforts.

3-Tuesday. Beware of any engagement of a commercial or monetary nature on this day and hold on to the purse-strings, lest extravagant expenditures exhaust the finances without satisfactory returns; the latter part of the afternoon and evening are the best parts of the day and encourage all mechanical undertakings, the initiation of very nice work by machinery, chemicals or manufacture of any kind, also for the elegant pursuits in any line; social, musical and dramatic engagements will be agreeable and satisfactory.

6-Wednesday. Make no personal application for favor from any public official of large corporations in the forencon, when conditions are adverse for dealings in patents or patented articles or any writings concerning novelties, trade marks, or copyrights; use the afternoon for important moves pertaining to real estate or buildings.

r—Thursday. After 10 o'clock in the morning give every energy to the prosecution of business, especially such as is concerned with trade, monetary matters and the literary world: make contracts with banks, with monied men or institutions, adjust accounts, open new places of business; enter upon educational schemes and plan all enterprises of consequence in ecclesiastical and judicial matters; the evening is specially favorable for extending mental labors and efforts in politic literature.

S-Friday. Seek promotion or advancement in employment during the early forenoon; have no dealings in tace or artistic goods from 9 to 12 in the forenoon when the elegant pursuits meet hindrances; the early afternoon is good for dealings with railroads and government officials, also with persons of marked eccentricity of habit; do not seek the society in the evening when conditions hinder progress of matters or consequences.

9-Saturday. Push all matters vigorously during this day, giving preference, if any, in the afternoon for transactions pertaining to the literary and scientific pur-

10—Sunday. Not particularly promising for a Sab-bath day, though likely to be marked by increased abili-ty and vigor, inducing out-of-door exercise and recrea-tion.

tion.

11—Monday. Bright and prosperous are the conditions of this day; authors and artists are particularly favored in their business dealings and dealers in scientific and artistic works and productions should vigorously improve every moment. Conditions give special activity to dealings in fancy goods, jewelry, perfumes, silks and all articles of adornment, also household goods and furnishings; architectural and horticultural work should be planned and urged on this day, begin journeys, change residences, deal with great corporations and should be planned. be planned and urged on this day, begin journeys, change residences, deal with great corporations and public offi-cials; urge all transactions relating to building and min-ing.

12—Tuesday. This day has but little to recommend it until the late afternoon; it is not favorable for a birthday anniversary and all persons claiming it or who were born about the 9th of January, 15th of April, 20th of May, 14th of July, 17th of October, or 1st of December, of past years, should be careful of health for some months to come, and be guarded in their acts and so cautious in their associations as not to debase themselves or hurt their good name and honor among their fellow men: let all such be on the alert against deceit or being misled into holding evil communications. Give preference to the late afternoon for crowding all general business.

13—Wednesday. Begin the day early for pushing important matters in trade, avoiding dealings with corposations in the middle hours of the day and particularly urging the literary pursuits in the last half of the day, when mental efforts will be peculiarly happy and effectual; do correspondence, adjust accounts and travel.

14—Thursday. A very indifferent day, without spe-

14-Thursday. A very indifferent day, without spe-ial promise in any direction.

15—Friday. Use the pen cautiously during the forenoon; engage no help nor journey unnecessarily; as the evening approaches more than usual caution will need to be exercised to guard against contention and quarrels;
the tongue otherwise is likely to prove an unruly member and involve thee unpleasantly.

ber and involve thee unpleasantly.

16—Saturday. Dramatists, musicians, artists, jewelers, upholsterers and furniture dealers are "under the ban," experience losses and embarrassments, and will need to exercise extraordinary caution in all their acts; it will be well for theatrical managers and artists, if they have deterned entering into very important professional engagements during these passing days; let the fair sex especially avoid this day for any kind of a matrimonial engagement, and social entertainments are not likely to prove successful or happy.

17.—Sanday. One of the best Sabbaths of the month

17—Sunday. One of the best Sabbaths of the month, especially so for the good and prosperity of church matters and for religious and moral improvement.

18-Monday. The inventive faculties are now unusually acute and some remarkable discovery in electrical apparatus or process is likely at this time; public men and persons in charge of great corporations will be agreeably disposed during this forenoon.

19—Tuesday. An unfavorable day in nearly all respects and the atternoon hours caution against the execution of deeds or writings and discourage the doing or correspondence of importance; keep the temper in the evening or bad quarrels arise.

20 - Wednesday. Give preference to the forence for the most important of the undertakings; the elegant and artistic pursuits are adversely affected in the afternoon; the evening gives much improvement and should be used for planning all engagements pertaining to manufacture, construction, building and mining enterprises.

23—Saturday. This day is evil for the most part, as malicious conditions conduce to bad accidents and physical detriment; let the tongue be kept well under control and controversies of all kinds be avoided; keep out of the way of harm from machinery or falling objects. Let all persons born about the 13th of January, or April, or the 18th of July or 17th of October of past years, especially observe the above suggestions and have care in all matters of diet for avoidance of stomach and kidney troubles; they should especially beware of stimulating foods and drinks, and those accustomed to indulgences in intoxicating drinks will need to be peculiarly on guard to avoid very serious if not fatal harm from their habits.

27—Wednesday. An evil day in which particularly matters of much importance are best deferred; see that thy tongue or pen do no violence to good judgment on this day; have no dealings in stocks or in speculations of any kind; those employed with the pen should act with great circumspection; errors of account are more than usually liable in the forenoon hours. These suggestions are especially applicable to persons born about the 10th of March, 9th of June, 10th of September, or 8th of December, of past years. Such persons are likely to be experiencing very trying evils, either in their domestic or business affairs, or are having physical troubles of peculiar and baffling character. Married ladies so born will need to be very circumspect in deportment and exercise more than ordinary patience and forbearance with their husbands, and no some, at best, will come quarrels, disagreements, separations, or even divorce, or unusual misfortunes to or through their married partners or near male relatives in these passing weeks. Broken engagements and strange and unexpected social disorders are threatened in the lives of marriageable ladies who were so born.

29—Friday. Give preference to the forencen and the very late afternoon hours for thy most important engagements; the afternoon hours are baffling in nearly all matters, but particularly such as are concerned with real estate and building; give attention in the evening to all classes of literary and intellectual work.

30—Saturday. Avoid rashness of word or act and be not easily moved to wrath; the day is peculiarly dangerous for surgical operations, especially if performed upon the head, stomach, or kidneys; the afternoon and evening threaten the purse and thou art cautioned not to buy articles except for urgent matters, as the purchases so made are likely to give you little satisfaction and be unprofitable.

SEE THAT DANDRUFF?

A dandruff-bedecked garment is not pleasing to the eye, and materially detracts from an appearance otherwise impressive. Such miniature "snow-falls" not only mar the evidences of dressy gentility, but point to careless neglect of the hair and scalp, and foreshadow the be-traying signs of age—gray hair, thin growth or baldness. If the evidence is on you, the friend who gently brushes it off is perfectly justified in scolding you for your palpable neglect of your hair and scalp, particularly if your attention has ever been called to the wonderful proper-

Mrs. J. S. Dann, 1006 Franklin Street, Reading, Pa., writes:

"I am pleased to inform you that I am cured of all my hair troubles. The itching and dandruff have passed away and the hair has ceased to fall out. My husband has also been greatly benefitted by the removal of dandruff from his head."

Miss Mabel E. Ferris, teacher of Physical Culture and Delsarte, Delmar, N. Y., says:

"A few months ago, during severe illness, my hair began falling out to an alarming degree. The use of Cranitonic Hair Food stopped it, and after a few bottles, new hair started out all over my head. I now have a thicker growth of hair than I ever had before."

RICH ART TABLE COVER 30 Armenian Needlework Designs So Closely Followed as to Defy Detection.

Read How You May Get this Splendid Japanese Gift for Your Own Home.

The most gifted race in the world with the needle are the Orientals. For centuries the rich and varied designs worked by their hands have been the admiration and delight of lovers of art. A few years ago an American was fortunate enough to invent machinery that would reproduce these rich designs of embossed embroidery and needlework, even to the delicate films of gold-thread work. Still more curious the Japanese obtained plans and made similar machinery, so that they have the addition of "cheap labor" to Yankee machinery. In this way the most delicate Armenian and Turkish needlework is imitated so closely that none but the expert, on close examination, reveals the minor points of imitation.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT

EITHER the small boy, nor the pedestrian, stopping to look at the array of fire-works in the shop windows, has any idea of the enormous trade windows, has any idea of the enormous trade in these "gems of fire" or the method of their manufacture. All through the winter months the factories, big and little, have been preparing to fill the orders that come pouring in from all parts of the United States and Europe—for Yankee ingenuity has invented specialties in pyrotechnics that are unequaled. Each factory has its own designs and devices in tireworks, and the rivalry between the firms at times burns as fiercely as their powder. The small boy who pictures to himself the fun of filling rockets full of stars, of stuffing Roman candles with balls, of building dandy big pin wheels, would be a trifle awed at the quiet and order that reigns in a fireworks factory. Before the visitor is admitted to the building he dons a pair of thick woolen shoes, then follows the guide over the copper covered floor to the powder room, where about a dozen men are feeding the revolving powder mills. The sulphur, charcoal and saltpetre for the gunpowder are ground by small zinc balls that tumble about with a monotonous, rumbling noise.

In the rocket room, the work is divided betumble about with a monotonous, rumbling noise.

In the rocket room, the work is divided between many men. At one table the pasteboard tubes are made; at the next the fuses are put in, and so they pass on down the line until they reach the man who finishes them off with conical cap and stick. The materials for the stars are kept in air tight vessels, and mixed together with mealed powder and glue water. Men at side tables mix up the ingredients and form them into balls. This one of copper and zinc filings and potash will burn a beautiful blue; this of lampblack, strontia, potash, sulphur and charcoal, a bright crimson; this of amber, salt and rosin, gold; this of barytes, potash and sulphur, a gorgeous green. These balls are put in the tubes with the firing charges, and filled at the top with powder and steel filings. When these rockets "go off," showers of silvery sparks will surround the flashing stars.

steel nings. When these rockets "go off," showers of silvery sparks will surround the flashing stars.

More gorgeous rockets have layers of colored fire added to fall in showers of rain, or are packed with slender sticks of yellow fire to burst into sheaves of golden grain; still others are filled with nests of young snakes to go hissing and writhing across the sky; while the triumph is reached in the rockets that explode and expand into parachutes, that go floating gracefully through the air, supporting burning globes, which change from gold to purple, then in turn to red, blue, green and silver. These rockets require delicate manipulation, and there are many little secrets connected with their manufacture which the visitor is not allowed to penetrate.

Equal variety in design is found in the bomb room. After the firing charges and fuses are in place, separate charges of powder are put in the centers of the bombs, and the "display" packed around the sides. Some bombs are packed with balls that will burst into flaming suns; others are filled with golden fire and small colored balls, to spread into sparkling sheets of flame showered with stars; and in still others the balls are arranged in the shape of stars, triangles and wheels that will whirl and flash in the air with dazzling rapidity; but the most splendid of all is the bomb that bursts into a globe of golden light, turning to blue as it slowly descends, then bursts into balloons of variegating colors, which finally explode into showers of shooting stars of rainbow hues.

The popular Roman candles are very simple affairs. Long pasteboard tubes are plugged to balloons of variegating colors, which finally explode into showers of shooting stars of rainbow hues.

The popular Roman candles are very simple affairs. Long pasteboard tubes are plugged to receive the charges of slow burning powder, then colored balls and charges of powder are alternately put into the cases until filled, fuses inserted and the tops covered.

How the small boy would stare could he behold the men making aerial "flower pots" and "bouquets," as they ladle in the powder and pour in hundreds of balls to blossom into prismatic flowers, the like of which were never seen on this earth before. The shower of American Beauty roses is one of the most brilliant of these "flower pieces," while the vases and cornucopias of flowers that change in hue against backgrounds of silver and gold spangles are strong rivals in popularity.

As for the penny pin-wheel, it counts its relatives by the dozens. Rows and rows hang up drying, some with single tubes, some with three that will throw out showers of balls and tiny stars, some that stop suddenly and revolve in the opposite direction. With all of these the small boy will scorch his fingers and blacken his face, trying to make them go around, for the pin-wheel is the most erratic of all fireworks, stopping and starting off again in the most unexpected fashion. The double wheels have six short tubes of colored fire attached to the rims, small boxes of fire fastened to the spokes and tubes of parti-colored spangles wired out from the hubs.

But the zenith of pyrotechnic display in the pin-wheel line is reached in a large wheel suspended from a standard. Upon the rim large tubes of white and colored fire are arranged irregularly. Fastened to the center of each spoke is a small wheel and three boxes of tinted stars and spangles grouped on either side. When the fuse is touched off the whole wheel is soon ignited and hereins to revolve the whole design regularly. Fastened to the center of each spoke is a small wheel and three boxes of tinted stars and spangles grouped on either side. When the fuse is touched off the whole wheel is soon ignited and begins to revolve, the whole design bursting forth, revealing a dream of color that glows, and flashes and blends into the glory of sunset skies. A row of these wheels set off in a framework of silver birches and golden willow trees is a spectacle not easily described. "Wigglers" that go darting high up across the sky bursting into a myriad of small "twisters;" "chasers" that fly back and forth in the air like maddened serpents till they melt into a thin trail of red fire; balls that spread out gracefully into a peacock's tail, or explode into a waterfall of golden spangles, are some of the novelties designed especially for this year's firework displays. In making fireworks the fuse gives the most trouble, how to get it just right so it will burn neither too fast nor too says:—"Statistics prove that a mosquito-ridden neighborhood is a most dangerous locality for residence and that in localities infested with these disease-carrying insects the death rate is exceedingly high."

Dr. A. F. A. King, in a paper read before the Philosophical Society of Washington, says:—"Malarial diseases are spread through the instrumentality of mosquitoes which by their punctures inoculate the body with the malarial poison."

A year ago several experiments in Cuba resulted in the death of the subjects. Two Spaniards who submitted to the test were bitten by infected mosquitoes, died very quickly with severe cases of yellow fever, caused by the insect injecting the deadly virus of yellow fever into their system. Miss Clara Maass, a trained nurse in Havana, was the last victim. She allowed a mosquito to bite her arm. The venom soon took effect and her death resulted. These tests prove beyond question that the mosquito is the most dangerous of all insects, carrying and spreading disease wherever it goes.

J. R. Kean, Surgeon U. S. V., writes: "The role of the mosquito in the transmission of certain diseases is now well established. The evidence is now perfect and conclusive that malaria, as well as filarial infections are carried by this insect."

Swanson's "5-DROPS" is a positive antidote for the poisonous bites of these insects. fifteen feet square, holding the traditional arrows and olive branches; his background is a network of rockets, candles, fire and rain. His body is made of golden stars, the shield is worked out in red and white, with a blue field studded with stars. The outline of this, as well as all set pieces, are formed with thick paper tubes at the back of the design, and also serve as fuses. The piece is touched off at several points and should ignite rapidly to display the whole device before any one part has burned out. Steadily and majestically the eagle burns, while showers of stars, rain and spangles in myriads of colors, shoot forth into flashing rays around him. Across the bottom of the frame golden stars twinkle out until the word "Liberty" appears.

No celebration of the 4th would be complete without "The Star Spangled Banner," either in the form of aerial fireworks or a set piece. Nothing can add to the dignity or beauty of the "Flag of the Brave," "the sign of hope and triumph high," as its stars glitter and the stripes unfold across the sky with only the clouds for its background.

Battleships and portraits of heroes and states-its background.

Battleships and portraits of heroes and statesmen are also popular among the simple set pieces. In the Niagara Falls, the landing of Columbus, the battle of Santiago, the battle of Manila, etc., thousands of stars, rockets, bombs, lights and other fireworks are used, and they are the result of much time and labor. These are but a few of the fireworks prepared for the celebration of the Glorious Fourth, but all the others are mere variations of the same principles. From them some idea may be formed of the care and skill required for the manufacture of even the simplest Roman candle.

Strange as it may appear we cannot make firecrackers to equal the Chinese, they seem to possess some secret knowledge for their manu-sunset skies. A row of these wheels set off in a framework of silver birches and golden willow trees is a spectacle not easily described.

"Wigglers" that go darting high up across the sky bursting into a myriad of small "twisters;" "chasers" that fly back and forth in the air like maddened serpents till they melt into a thin trail of red fire; balls that spread out gracefully into a peacock's tail, or explode into a waterfall of golden spangles, are some of the novelties designed especially for this year's firework displays. In making fireworks the fuse gives the most trouble, how to get it just right so it will burn neither too fast nor too slow, is a difficult problem. The success or failure of the fuse is a very important matter in the set pieces.

The Great American Eagle is a much demanded piece for the Fourth. He stands in a frame Strikes still prevail in various parts of the country, and the strikers are still using their brawn instead of their brains to gain their points. Some day they will learn where their strength is and will be wiser and more successful. They have plenty of strength of the right kind, but they do not seem to be able to use it.

It was generally supposed that former President Cleveland had retired forever from politics, but since he made his appearance in New York where he talked to David B. Hill, for the first time in years, it begins to look as if his party has not entirely given up all idea of his availability as a Presidential candidate. Strange things happen in politics.

Mr. Rockefeller, the so called "richest man on earth." and the head of the great Standard Oil Trust, has reached out for more worlds to conquer, and is now combining all the big pork packing establishments that he can gather in. Rockefeller probably fears that he will be a poor man some day, and he wants to provide for his family in case of hard times. And the Bible says a man who won't provide for his family is worse than an infidel.

We may have to forego the comfort that the flippant philosophy of a proverb has furnished. "As good fish in the sea as ever were caught' has consoled many a loser who has seen the fish slip off the hook or out of the net just at the critical moment. Science will take all the poetry and part of the philosophy out of our existence. A committee on biology has been appointed to determine if there is any danger of the seas being fished out. If they decide that there is such danger, a calendar committee should be appointed to abolish Friday, for what would Friday be without fish?

The railroad people would try to make the world believe that since the railroads have come in the great rivers of the country are of no particular use as freightways. Yet on the last rise in the Ohio river in six days six million bushels of coal left Pittsburg for points down the river. With all the great railroad facilities of Pittsburg, this work could not have been done by them in a month, five times as long as required by the river, and at freight rates far in excess of the water route. The railroads are all right in their field, but they can never take the place of our rivers, and the peopleat large should always be favorable to all wise legislation looking to their improvement.

The American people are really a hard people same strenuousness with which they pursue business. With feverish energy they exhort first this then that form of amusement. Golf, bicycling and bridge whist are taken up and dropped. Each "would-be-fashionable" professes the most intense devotion to the sport that is popular for the moment. The newspapers are filled with the technical terms of the fad Ping Pong! How much more mysterious it sounds than plain table tennis. How the scribes do delight in saying that he pinged an argument to his opponent who ponged it back again. How the Pharisees do delight in dwelling on the pleasures of Ping Pong. Sad to think that by the time the roses bloom again the game and the name will be forgotten.

Every year in London the Americans have a Fourth of July dinner at which everybody makes a real Star-Spangled-Banner-Fourthof-July speech and spouts away in fine style. They like to do it the more because they

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY HOLMAN F. DAY.

Copyr : jht, 1902, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher. Grand-daughter Katherine married tonight!
I am weary of music and laughter and greeting;
I have stolen away from the riot and light,
—Ah, gallant old comrade, the years have been fleeting.

I am old, and I am bent, I am wrinkled and white And I felt like a ghost at the wedding tonight. I searched through the mansion from celler to garret

For a little dark corner—no lover could spare it!
So I've hastened away from the music and laughter,
With splendor and melody pulsating after,
—Hobbling as fast as my old legs were able
Down to the gloom of your stall in the stable.

Now lie where you are in the straw, my old chap! Come nuzzle your grizzled, brown nose in my lap, While I stroke through the strands of your ragged, grey mane.

The banner in many a hard-won campaign.
We have fought the good fight, you and I, my old beauty,

And ever with faithful regard for our duty;
Who will challenge our pride as tonight we look back,

I on my statecraft and you on the track?

For we trotted our squarest and steadiest gait,

You on the race-course and I for the State.

Do you hear, my old fellow, the pulsing and beating Of the passionate waltz in the mansion up there? As it floats to us here it seems softly repeating A song and a toast of the past, my Lothair.

—The song and the toast that I boldly sung When the clang of the glass with a challenge rung, And with flaming soul

I took the pole
And past Life's grandstand gaily swung:
Here is my toast to the thoroughbred!
After he dies he's a long time dead;
Dying, he goes—where? Well, God knows!
And exactly where God has not said.

Who dare say where?
Yet this I'll swear
That the thoroughbred here will be thoroughbred There.

There.
But the boastings of Life are behind us, old fellow, We covered our course to the sere and the yellow. We covered our course to the sere and the yellow. We are turned out to run, two old Has-Beens together,
Too feeble for bridle, or bit or for tether.
But, faithful campaigner, the good time was, when Our stride was the topic for thousands of men. I marshalled the van of the Law and the State, And you on the race-course were fairly my mate. All the victories won were the victories fought—Inch by inch, word by word, not entreated or bought.
So there's naught of regret though the racing is over;
We can feel there are due us a few days in clover,—A bit of a rest in the lengthening shadows Before we're turned loose in the asphodel meadows.
Do you hear, my old fellow, the wailing and sigh-

Do you hear, my old fellow, the wailing and sigh-

Do you hear, my old lenow, the waining and signing of the far violins in the mansion up there?
I've tried all my life not to think about dying,
But we're down the homestretch to the wire, Lothair.
Is it silence and stall till the Judgment Day?
Or a welcome and wisp of celestial hay?
Do we blindly thrust
From Life's Track dust
To be fined for our stumbles along the way?
But here's hope for the thoroughbred—hope for the man
Who has raced and finished as best he ean;
May the Judge Most High cast gracious eye

Eagle fly high. It is a real vent to their pent up feelings and is a good thing, but this year, Ambassador Choate, because King Edward was still not out of danger, decided there were to be no speeches at the dinner. This was simply awful, but Mr. Choate was firm, and the regular dinner passed off speechless except for two responses to "The King" and "The President." He left the dinner at ten o'clock to meet some diplomatic engagement, and no sooner had he gone than the true American spirit began to bubble up strong, and it wasn't lon; before the very liveliest kind of American speeches were being made all around the hall, even the

It is an undoubted fact that there are a vast number of unclaimed estates in England, some of them very large and in the hundreds of thousands of dollars. An official list of these estates has been obtained from the British Government, and for the benefit of those readers of "Comfort" whose fathers, grandfathers, great-grandfathers, or great-grandfathers may have originally come from the British Isles, and who may have left property to which the present generation are the surviving heirs, we have compiled a little booklet entitled "Comfort's List of Heirs," particulars of which may be are on foreign soil and they want to see the found in our advertising columns.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

HERE will be a grand display of beauty in the garden this month, if the right kind of material is there and it was only cared for during the earlier part of the season. Among the hardy herbaceous plants, the "Golden Glow" Rudbeckia will stand out prominently because of the rich color. A clump is sufficient to light up a garden like a burst of sunshine. Every one ought to grow this plant because it can always be depended on to do its share without coaxing and coddling. It never winter-kills. It ways be depended on to do its share without coaxing and coddling. It never winter-kills. It never fails to blossom, and so profusely that it appears, at a little distance, like a solid mass of yellow. It is easily propagated by division of the roots. A bit of crown with a bit of root attached will grow into a goodsized plant next season. Because of its tall growth, it should be given a place in the background.

Another most excellent hardy plant that will be in the height of its beauty during this month is the perennial Phlox. You will find some varieties of it in nearly every country garden. There ought to be several there where as a general thing there is but one. It is a plant as hardy as a Lilac. It grows rapidly. It requires as little care as any plant I know of, and as for its flowers where will you find anything that equals them in richness of color and profusion? Each stalk sent up from healthy roots will bear a head of bloom a foot long and nearly as wide, with hundreds of flowers in the cluster, and there will be so many stalks that you get a solid body of color from the flowers they support. There are many varieties, ranging from pure white to darkest crimson, delicate rose, carmine, lilac, mauve and rosy violet, and all are good. Some sorts grow to a height of four feet, while others are many to little more than a foot. Care must be taken if from division of the roots. September is the proper time to set out new plants of it.

Many of our common flowers, such as we grow in the garden in summer, make excellent winter plants. There is the single Petunia, for instance. Give it a six or seven inch pot of moderately rich soil, a sunny window to grow in, water enough to keep its roots moist all the time and, almost any temperature above freezing-point, and it will bloom freely all winter long. Few plants give a more cheerful eftime very riveriest kind of American speeches were being made all around the hall, even the English guests taking part and adding to the patriotism of the occasion by adding the good things they had to say of America and Americans. It was a great Fourth of July dinner after all, and no thanks to Ambassador Choate who ought to have known better than to try to gag the glorious Fourth.

It may not be generally known to our readers that "Comfort" has now for some time had an office in London, England, and we hope to be able to bind still closer the ties of kinship which exist between the two countries. Our representatives in London have been looking closely into the affairs of our British cousins, and one of the things which caused them astonishment was the large number of vast estates, money and property in England for which no owners are known. It was an English professor who remarked not long ago that in no country but his own could there be not only so much unclaimed money, but so many persons ignorant of their claims or how to select the ten and the first and pot it carefully. Water it well to settle the soil about its roots, and set it in a shady place for a week or more. As a general thing, a plant will keep on growing as if nothing had happened to it, and by October it will be ready to bloom. But I would not let it do so. Keep all buds picked off until about the holiday season. Then give it a chance to show what it can do, and you will be delighted with it. Chinese Pinks are good winter-bloomers if taken up early in the season and allowed to become thoroughly established in pots before being taken into the house. So are the Marguerite Carnations which we find growing in nearly every country garden nowadays. In the open garden they are not as satisfactory as we would like to have them, because they come into bloom so late in the season.

places where they are to bloom. They will be found most effective if set in groups. Five or six plants of the same color, or of colors that contrast harmoniously, will give a much finer effect than single specimens, because of the greater body of color obtained by this means. Rose-colored and white kinds look well together. So do the pink and pale yellow sorts. But avoid putting the pink and red varieties together, if you want harmony. Now is a good time to sow Pansies for early flowering next spring. Or, if you look] over the bed where these plants grow, you may find a good many seedlings. These can be set out in beds of rich soil, where they will make a good strong growth before winter sets in. If you want Pansies as soon as the snow goes away, you will have to depend on fall-grown plants for them. So get ready for a fine display of them by giving them the attention they need at this season.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"How shall I take care of my Rambler Roses this fall?" Mrs. W.—Lay the bushes down on the ground when you are sure that cold weather is at hand, and cover them with sand or dry earth to the depth of three or four inches. Throw abasettal of coarse litter over the roots of the plants.

"Can I move Rose-bushes safely in fall, or should I wait until spring?" S. S. R.——The bushes can be moved safely as soon as the foliage is ripe. Disturb the roots as little as possible. Cut away at least half the top. Make the soil firm about their roots, and water well.

"What will kill lice on the Lady Washingtes Geranium? My plants are literally covered with them, and nothing that I have tried has any effect on them." Amateur.—There is an insecticite that I depend on because it is cheap, always a hand, easy to prepare, safe, and always effective. It is made by shaving a quarter of a pound of lvory soap, such as we use in the household, into this strips and melting it. Put this in a pailful of water, and give the infested plants a bath in it. one application is not enough, give another, and keep doing so until there is not an insect to be found.

"How often shall I water my plants? Some tell me three times a week, and some say every day. Which is right?" Mrs. O.— There is no positive rule. There can be none, for plants, under certain conditions, may not need it more than twice a week. We must give as needed, and in order to understand the needs of the plant we must keep watch of it. If the soil looks dry on the surface, it is to be taken for granted that more water is needed, and enough should be given to thoroughly saturate all the soil in the pot. Then wait mult the surface of the soil looks dry again. This is the general rule by which we water plants. Observation will enable you to modify it to suit existing conditions. Much more water is needed in summer evaporation takes place rapidly, and in winter very slowly.

ration takes place rapidly, and in winter very slowly.

"I want to set out some Tulips and Hyacintha this fall. I have read somewhere that this ought to be done next month, but a friend says wait until November. What would you advise?" P. D. F. —I would advise September planting, by all means. For this reason: Bulbs set out then make a strong root-growth during the fall. This growth must be made before flowering-time if fine flowers are wanted. If it is not made during the fall, there will be very little time to make it in, is spring, consequently you will not be likely to get really good flowers. Therefore set out your bulbs early, and let them get ready for next springs work at their leisure. I would never advise putting bulbs into the ground after the middle of 0ctober, at the north.

"I have been told that old geraniums are not good winter-bloomers. Is this so? I have several plants I kept in the house last winter. They bloomed finely. This summer I have not allowed them to bloom, calculating on getting winter flowers from them again. If they are of no value for a second season, I would like to know it in time to get some young plants started." H. D. D. — Your Geraniums are just what you need for your winter-garden next winter. A young plant may give a few clusters of flowers, but it cannot give many, because it hasn't flowering-surface enough. Old plants, having many branches, will give a score of clusters it hasn't flowers, but It cannot give many scanned it hasn't flowering-surface enough. Old plants, having many branches, will give a score of clusters where a young plant will give one, and are more desirable than a young plant, in every way. Feed them well with liquid manure, or by mixing in old, well-rotted cow manure from the barnyard with the soil, and they will delight you with the beauty of their blossoms during the entire season.

"Schoolmarm." Young Geraniums are not satisfactory for winter use, because, as a rule, they have very few branches, and the quantity of flowers depends upon the bushiness of a plant. Old plants, if cut back at this season and forced to produce new branches, will give far greater satisfaction. It smaller plants are preferred for winter, start them from cuttings next spring. Do not allow them to bloom during summer. Pinch off the ends of them from time to time to make them throw out branches. In this way you secure a busby, compact plant with a large amount of flowering surface.

The papers were alleged by Madame Humbert to be locked up in her safe, where, under the French law they could not be got at for several years. On the supposition that they were telling the truth, and by several suits brought by their coconspirators which were decided in their favor, they succeeded in borrowing money from all sorts of people, business men, bankers, and others, until they had gathered in something like twenty million francs, about four million dollars. when a mattress is new it should be encased in a cover of unbleached sheeting, which should be removed and washed once a year. This keeps the dust from the mattress cover. When people live in or near a city, the easiest and most satisfactory way for cleansing blankets is to send them to a regular cleanser. The charge is only seventy-five cents for a pair, and they are re-bound if they need it, and returned to you in almost as good condition as when first bought. If it is not possible, however, to have it done outside, choose a warm, sunny day. Brush and shake them thoroughly to remove as much dust as possible before wetting them. Put some household ammonia in the tub, in the proportion of a tablespoonful to each quart of water; pour warm water over the ammonia before putting in the blankets; then put in the blankets and move them around in the water, but do not rub them. Rinse in warm water, press through a wringer, but do not wring with the hands. Hang out to dry in the shade, where there is good air, squeezing the lower edge of the blankets occasionally, to get rid of the water that runs down from the top while drying.

It is better, when blankets are first bought.

while drying.

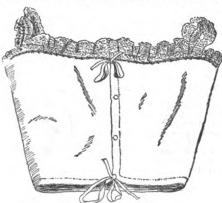

It is better, when blankets are first bought, to cut them in two and bind the edges, for in washing it is much easier to cleanse one and then the other, rather than the two at once in the same tub. Then, too, there are times when only one blanket is needed on the bed, and it is easier to have a single one to use them to is easier to have a single one to use, than to handle the double ones, only using half.

description of a warm weather nightgown in last month's issue of COMFORT, asks if we can give as satisfactory a pattern for a corset cover. We think we can, and are glad to do so here-

The beauty of this cover is that it has no seams. It is cut on the bias, Long Cioth being used. The diagram will show the shape, and of course the size is determined by the measurements of the person who is to wear it. The lower line, which is the waist, should be an inch longer than the size of the waist, and the upper line long enough to be comfortable across the bust. The waist is cut and hemmed all around, narrowly, except the two front edges which are turned in enough to lap an inch. Then the top of the cover is trimmed with lace beading, lace insertion and lace edge, in the order given, and straps made for the shoulders of the same, and sewed on back and front where the armhole shows in the diagram. Buttons and buttonholes are made in the front, riboon is run through the beading and into the lower hem, and the waist is complete. If a waist that is fuller across the bust is desired, all that is necessary is to tuck the cloth top and bottom, across the front, tucks running up and down, fastening the tucks only at the top and bottom, and letting the cloth out loose between. In cutting for this, simply allow nine inches on each end, which will give all the fullness desired. Slim people like to do this, but stout people are looking for just such a pattern as the diagram, for it fits the figure like the proverbial glove.

It is then I refresh my mentality with a glance into a book that I keep for the purpose. It is a blank book, and it is slowly filling up with matter of my own culling.

"Really bright and fresh stories that I hear, good and adaptable thoughts that I come across either in a book or in the speech of friends, I copy out in this little volume for service when I most need them."

This isn't a bad idea, by any means, as we are all expected to be at our best when invited out and to do our share of the entertaining, and this is no small matter when one has had a fatiguing day, or, perhaps, is feeling indisposed. With such a book to glance into just before going out, one's mind is taken off one's self, and one or two suggestions from the book will set the tired brain in motion and lead to all sorts of interesting thoughts and ideas which would otherwise have lain dormant.

A pretty fancy for a children's party where small favors are to be distributed, is to have a large, round cardboard box with a cover, as a receptacle for the gifts. Before the box is iced, small gifts are rolled in tissue paper and placed inside, tied around with narrow ribbons or gold and silver cords, and the ends of the cords are left quite long and all together, so that when the piece of the cover is removed, an end of each cord or ribbon is given each little guest and he or she can draw out the gift on the other end of the cord. of the cord.

Workers are most, if not all the time, directed to use two shuttles, but if you will try my plan of using one shuttle and a spool of thread you will find you can avoid making knots on the half-loop (or under-loop), which makes neater, stronger work. When shuttle needs refilling, use thread from another spool for the purpose.

To begin: Make a loop with shuttle thread thus: 8 stitches (or, as they are usually called by most instructors, double knots), 1 picot: 8 stitches; a second picot; 8 stitches, a third picot; 8 stitches, then draw closely to form the loop, in which are 32 stitches (or 16 double knots), with little picots on it.

Draw the stitches closely toward left hand, open fingers, and the spool thread will drop. Twenty stitches will make a more drooping curve to the half-loop, and, if you wish, you can make picots on it, too.

Turn work "right side up," put shuttle thread round fingers and make another whole loop—drawing the first stitch as closely as possible to the half loop. Reverse work; make half loop—and so proceed as directed.

A New Use for Shoe Strings.

Shoe strings have heretofore been considered as only useful articles, but now they will have to be classed as ornamental as well. The unique way of utilizing them for purposes other than for what they were intended, originated with a Western woman, and the craze for shoe string bags, belts, neckties and hat bands quickly spread all over the country, and now every up-to-date woman has, or intends to have, one or more of these articles.

every up-to-date woman has, or intends to have, one or more of these articles.

They are very durable, inexpensive, pretty, and above all, easily made. The belts are great favorites as they adjust themselves to the form and stay in place. They can be made of black, brown, blue, or crimson, or braided in a pattern combining two or more colors as one prefers. The bags are very handsome when made of black shoe strings and lined with a bright color. Any of the articles would make an acceptable birthday or Christmas present, and hat bands made of the different college colors are at present very popular with students.

The leading articles of favor and now most made by ladies for general use are the shoe string bags and shoe string belts that are illustrated on this page, and, believing that our readers will appreciate the opportunity to obtain full and complete instructions and material to make up these various articles, we have taken it upon ourselves to prepare a set of

HE origin of the word "tost" in drinking a health is interesting. In the 16th century a piece of toast was added to the drinks, which floated on the liquor and was supposed to give additional flavor. A story is told of that time regarding a certain beau, at Bath, who pledged a noted beauty in a glass of water taken from her bath, whereupon another beau and the would have nothing to meaning the lady herself. From this incident is said to have arisen the habit of giving a lady's name to preface or flavor the drinking of wine. HE origin of the word "toast"

HY, Flossie, child, where have you been?" questioned Mrs. been?" questioned Mrs. Joycotte as the girl hurried, an hour later, into the parsonage. "And as white as a ghost, too! Flossie sank spiritlessly on the sofa. "Yes, without success."

Mrs. Joycotte brought her a glass of wine.
"Take this, dear. Then it's well that I have been more fortunate. I believe I have secured you a good place—that is, if you don't mind hard work."

Weary though she was, Flossie's face brightened; she put down the wine glass. "Mind her.

The next day, however, she arranged Flossie's hair herself and pinned a fresh lace frill into the girl's black gown. "It's necessary that you should look very pretty," said she, laughing. "Old Mrs. Towers cannot bear anyone near her who is not young and lovely."

"Then I'm to be a companion?" said Flossie. "And whose?"

"Didn't I tell you? Mrs. Tressilian Towers."
"But I don't know who she is."

"But I don't know who she is."
"That shows how ignorant you are of New York society. She is Mrs. Vaillant's mother; She lives at No. — Fitty-Eighth Street; she is very old and childishly young—she is pink and white like a rose, and yet she is shriveled like a nummy."

I don't understand you," faltered Flossie. "I don't understand you," faltered Flossie.

"Put on your hat, dear, and we'll start," said Mrs. Joycotte. "I don't wonder that you are puzzled. But we are late already. Mrs. Tower is very capricious, and it may cost you your situation if we keep her waiting. I can tell you about it as we walk. Mrs. Vaillant is a very fashionable lady, and her mother, Mrs. Towers, was a famous beauty, half a century ago, and is an enormously rich woman now. But she had a severe illness—some trouble of the brain—vers before you were born. Flossie—and when years before you were born, Flossie—and when she recovered her reason was practically gone with it. To this day she believes herself as young with it. To this dayshe believes herself as young and beautiful as Venus or Psyche or any of those ideals. And she is dressed and painted and gold powdered every day, and drives in the park, goes to big balls and drives her poor companions half crazy—indeed, they say she can never keep one more than a month at a time."

"She shall keep me!" cried Flossie earnestly.
"If only I am lucky enough to please her."
"Oh, she's a good-natured soul," said Mrs.
Joycotte, "only so full of whims and fancies.
Mad, of course—but it's a harmless mad, if you Mad, of course—but it's a natimess mad, if you give her plenty of cosmetics and listen to her talk about her own beauty and grace. It will be tedious, of course, but —"
"Not too tedious for me," said Flossie. "Oh,

I must find a home!"

Mrs. Joycotte looked surprised at the girl's ars. Joycotte looked surprised at the girl's big, frightened eyes. Flossie dropped them, terrified lest they should betray the experience through which she had yesterday passed. "For I never, never, could tell her how foolish I was to go with that man," thought Flossie. "She would despise me—and, after all, perhaps it isn't wrong to have a secret if it harms no one else."

"I am terrifying the poor child," thought Mrs. Joycotte, "and it won't be such a bad place. Flossie," she said aloud, "did you ever act in private theatricals?"

And Flossie started. "No," she answered, almost inaudibly, with wildly beating heart. Could Mrs. Joycotte know about the Æthalion Theatre and Madame Lavoglio?

"Well, this will be a sort of to-be-continued private theatrical all the time," said Mrs. Joycotte, "and you will be dresser and decorator allibitum, besides being an audience who must never get tired of the love stories and society triumphs of fifty years ago."

triumphs of fifty years ago."
Flossie gave a sigh of relief. "I shall not be she said.

"You are very white, dear," said her kind escort. "Are you sure we are not walking too fast?"

"Oh, quite sure," declared Flossie. "Is this the place? Why, it looks like a palace! I am alraid—"

Come," said Mrs. Joycotte, firmly, or Flossie might have quailed on the very doorstep.

A man servant in black showed them into a big semi-darkened room, soft with steam heat and odorous with blossoms of roses and blue and white violets, and disappeared, with Mrs. Joycotte's card on a silver salver.

A minute later the Persian portieres were lifted and a strange vision glided in, leaning partly on a pearl topped cane, partly on the arm of a stout woman whose lace cap and muslin apron, tied over a black silk gown, betrayed the status of lady's maid.

status of lady's maid. "I'm sure I beg pardon, ladies," said this per-mage, "but she would come in. She always comes if she chances to hear the door bell. Oh ma'am, it wasn't my fault," to a portly, aged lady in a trailing tea-gown of pink Japanese silk, billowed over with cascades of creamy lace, who entered from an adjoining door at the same moment.

"Never mind, Morris," said the lady. "Good morning, Mrs. Joycotte."
But Flossie had stopped abruptly. Had her senses deserted her? or was she in a dream? In spite of Mrs. Joycotte's words of prepara-tion she hardly knew whether she was looking upon a beautiful vision of eighteen, or a figure stepped from one of Vandyke's old canvases. For a moment only, and then she became aware that the curling treasures were dyed, the eyebrows artificially manipulated, the complexion a dazzling sham, and the milk-white teeth mere porcelain. She looked intently at the beauty of half a century ago in sheer white muslin draperies and sparkling diamonds. The strange vision eyed her with equal earnestness.

nestness.
"Oh!" said she in a lisping baby voice, sweet "Oh!" said she in a lisping baby voice, sweet with the sweetness of forgotten years. "This is my new companion. Morris, I told you it was some one for me. Come here, darling, and kiss me. How pretty you are! And I am so glad! Wintergrove had a crooked nose and a wart under her chin. Beautiful people are always drawn towards each other, and Wintergrove hated me. But you are like a rose."

Mrs. Joycotte and the lady in the pink gown smiled at each other. "I knew she would suit," smiled at each other. "I knew she would suit, murmured the minister's wife, and the rich lady whispered back: "It's so fortunate!"

A faint odor of roses floated through the room as Mrs. Towers led Flossie towards the door.

"You must pardon us, ladies," said the beauty, "but I have been expecting this young friend for some time—Miss Eveleth, you know, Sir Brian's daughter. He wrote to me about her the night before he shot himself. Such a tragedy! But what could I do? I was engaged to Tressilian Towers then, and how could I disappoint him? Come up stairs, Miss Eveleth, and I'll show you your father's miniature, set in diamonds. Tressilian said I might keep set in diamonds. Tressilian said I might keep it. There is no harm in that, surely?"

"Not in the least, mamma," said Mrs. Valliant, yawning behind her pocket handkerchief. "Go with her, Miss—Field,—I think that is your name."

"No," lisped the sweet voice in resolute accents. "Miss Eveleth—didn't I tell you? Sir Brian's daughter. I think you are growing more stupid every day, Helena."

Flossie hung back a little, but Mrs. Joycotte nodded encouragingly, and she accompanied Mrs. Tower, greatly to Morris' relief.

"She have took to you wonderful, Miss," muttered the maid. "And a blessing it is, too, and I hope it'll last. Hush-sh,"—she stooped to pick up a jeweled hairpin—"she'll hear—she have got ears like an Indian hunter, and she near eighty." near eighty.

near eighty."

"Seventeen, Morris, not eighteen," said the lady, composedly. "But you're right. All my ancestors had quick hearing. Remain where you are. We do not need you, now that Sir Brian's daughter has come."

And the upshot of this strange visit was that Flossie Field was engaged as companion to Mrs. Tressilian Towers at a sum that seemed to her almost fabulous.

her almost fabulous.

"Oh, madam, I never can earn all that!" she protested to Mrs. Valliant, who settled the terms, while Madamoiselle Nanon, the hairdresser, was "doing" Mrs. Towers' golden tresses in her own bedroom. "You will have to keep a constant eye on her," said Mrs. Vaillant. "She takes the strangest fancies sometimes, and one can never relax one's vigilance. She tore up all Mr. Vaillant's business papers the other day, thinking they were her old love letters. She throws away money on beggars who call her a pretty young lady, and she gave my diamond cross to Morris yesterday because she thought the stones were false. She can never remember the right medicines to take, or the proper quantity. "Of course it's Morris' business to wait on her, but Morris won't have much chance now that she has taken such a fancy to you."

she has taken such a fancy to you."
"I will endeavor to please her," said Flossie

Nothing would suit Mrs. Towers short of Nothing would suit Mrs. Towers short of Flossie's going down to dinner with her, until the girl pleaded a piteous excuse.

"I have no dress, madam," she said at first, remembering the wonderful dinner costume of white chiffon and seed-pearl embroidery in which Mrs. Vaillant's tall daughter had swept past her.

"Nonsense!" said Mrs. Towers. "I'm g sure you could wear my dresses. There's a pale blue China crepe that would become you im-mensely. Morris, bring it here." And then Flossie was forced to fall back on

And then Flossie was forced to fall back on a headache.

"Though to be sure," said Mrs. Towers, "she must think me very heartless—It can't be a year since poor Sir Brian—dear me, dear me! I am so glad I remembered."

But on the second day the ghost of Sir Brian had passed entirely from the poor lady's memory, and Flossie was promoted to her own personality again.

personality again. "My companion, a charming creature of my own age, Miss Field of Field Court," she in-troduced her to some guests who were to dine at the house that day.

Miss Hilary Vaillant, a this season's beauty, lifted her pretty eyebrows. "The Field Court people are quite a different people," whispered she. "But Theodora is so ridiculous."

For Mrs. Towers would not allow her grand-daughter to call her any name but that of her girlhood, and treated her exactly as a contemgirlhood, and treated her exactly as a contemporary.

"Miss Field has sustained a family loss," said the beauty with dignity. "Else you would have the pleasure of dining with her. But she will join us in the drawing-room afterwards." So Flossie, in black taffeta dress with black lace veiling her beautiful shoulders, and a simple jet neck lace around her throat, which Mrs. Towers had given her, sat, palpitating, among the roses and orchids by the grand piano until the dinner guests should find their way back.

"Oh, if I could only run away and hide," thought she "What shall I say? Which way shall I look? And I don't think Miss Vaillant likes me very much—but if she knew that I was the one that picked up her Paderewski ticket, that day, and sat in her seat with her flowers in my hand, she would like me still less."

For Flossie Field was one of those who never forgot a face, and she had seen Hilary Vaillant in the carriage driving away from Carnegie Library on the eventful day that had already begun to color her destiny. Moreover she had heard her name on Mayne's lips when first he had entered the box, expecting to find her

"I suppose he comes here sometimes," thought Flossie, starting a little, as the electric radiance suddenly flamed up and the shadowy room became a blaze of light. There was a sound of nearing voices and soft, well-bred laughter, and the next minute Mrs. Towers entered. "Oh, here is my shrinking violet," she said,

"Oh, here is my shrinking violet," she said, in her lisping voice. "I hope you are not tired waiting, love. Here is a gentleman I wish to present to you. Miss Field of Field Court, this is Capt. Mayne from Devonshire, England, a near neighbor of poor dear Sir Brian Eveleth." Captain Mayne bowed low, but Flossie ignored him utterly. "May I go upstairs for my fan, Mrs. Towers?" she murmured, and vanished like an apparition.

CHAPTER VII.

There was a momentary silence among the guests. Captain Mayne colored and bit his lip. Miss Vaillant opened her eyes very wide, but Mrs. Towers smiled, supremely calm.

"Oh, my poor wounded dove!" she said.

"But you cannot marvel that the very mention of Sir Frien Evelety's news should guest her "But you cannot marvet that the very mention of Sir Brian Eveleth's name should upset her. I may trust to Captain Mayne's chivalry to excuse her. "But, mamma," whispered Hilary, her black brows knitting, just as Signora Delmata reached her famous "high G," "that girl should be taught a lesson. Because grandmamma is half-cracked, her companion has no business to behave like a lunatic. You really business to behave like a lunatic. You really must speak to her."

Mrs. Vaillant shook her head. "I don't dare to, Hilary," she murmured. "You know very

Mrs. Valuant shook her head. "I don't dare to, Hilary," she murmured. "You know very well that your grandmother will take no hints from me. Hush! People are looking at us." So it happened that Flossie, coming quietly down to breakfast next day with Mrs. Towers, received none of the rod that Hilary had in pickle for her, but she could not but observe that young lady's coldness toward her.

"But I can't help it," thought Flossie, her soft eyes filling with tears. "I will never speak to that man again if I can help it."
Flossie Field, however, was yet to learn that in Fate's web the silken threads overlap one in Fate's web the silken threads overlap one another in constantly recurring patterns. That very day she was sitting in the boudoir arranging some fresh violets in a cut glass vase during the temporary siesta of Mrs. Towers, who had dropped to sleep in the very midst of a long description of some young poet who had sought her love before she met the late Mr. Tressilian Towers, when Morris, the maid, put her head in at the door. in at the door.

"Please walk in, sir," she said to some one behind her. "Miss Hilary's out driving with her ma, and the old madam's asleep, but here's her companion."

"Mrs. Towers is asleep?" said a low, pleasant voice. "Then don't disturb her, pray. I can amuse myself here for the present."

As he lifted his hat courteously to the girl who sat blushing amoug the violets, her face suddenly brightened. "Why!" she exclaimed, "you are the gentleman whose picture I was so "you are the gentleman whose picture I was so stupid as to upset at the Exchange, are you not?"

"My name is Geoffry Marchlands," he said,

"My name is Geoffry Marchlands," he said, scarcely at first recognizing her in the semilight. "And you are—"
"I am Florence Field," she confessed, wondering why her heart beat so joyously, as if at the sight of some long-lost friend. "I—I am Mrs. Towers' companion."
"Oh!" said he, half smiling. "Then she has changed companions again? And so you are the young lady I met at the Exchange? Perhaps I shall not inconvenience you if I wait here

"Not at all," assented Flossie, moving her vases. "Did—did you sell your picture that day?"

A puzzled expression crossed his face. "What picture? Oh, I beg your pardon. No. I did not."

Flossie looked at him with soft, wistful eyes.
"I am so sorry," said she. "Neither have I heard

"Yes, I know that," he said.
"And very generous," Flossie added.
"I believe I may be sure of that."
"So—perhaps—I don't know—she might buy
it."

Did that glance of his mean surprise? Or was it annoyance? No, Flossie was sure there was nothing but kindness in the calm dark eyes that regarded her so curiously.

"I would not have mentioned it," said she, "only that I am poor myself, and know how difficult it is to live."

"Pray don't apologize," said he, sincerely.
"I shall not forget your kindness."—(And even at the same moment Flossie marvelled how she had dared to volunteer these unconsidered

"But I'm glad I told him," she thought, as she bent over the violets. "It is so very, very hard to need money."
"And how do you like your situation?" he asked, watching the flying fingers with the calm serious eyes that seemed to see so much.
"Very much!" cried Flossie. "Only—Mrs. Towers is so visionary, you know, and sometimes she fancies I am a girl who died long ago, and again she thinks I am old like herself, and it really seems as if I were always walking in a it really seems as if I were always walking in a

"I love her!" exclaimed Flossie, earnestly.

"But all the same, I am so very, very sorry for her. It is as if she were dead and buried, and had come back to life, like a ghost."

"Ah!" commented Marchlands. "But Mrs.

"Here she is now," said Flossie, with smiling eyes, but as the portiere was lifted she shrank back. It was Hilary Vaillant, who entered with blooming cheeks and eyes like deep blue Flossie rose with the vase of violets in her hand and left the room. But when she reached Mrs. Towers' luxuriant apartment, the old lady was still asleep, with Morris nodding over her knitting beside her.

"Mrs. Towers has not asked for me?" she whispered.

"No, miss," said Morris, laboring to pick up a dropped stitch. "She's sleeping like a baby."

Flossie sat down by the window and looked out toward the west, where the lace-like towers of the cathedral were outlined against the crimson sky.

"Why did Miss Vaillant send me away?" she asked herself. "Did I do anything wrong? I am sometimes careless and impulsive, I know, but what have I done that she should look so angry?"

Alas, poor Flossie, there were many of the world's hard lessons for her still to learn.

Nor was this the last rebuff she was compelled to endure. Apparently Hilary Vaillant had taken a dislike to her, nor was her mother much kinder. Mrs. Towers alone was her steady and constant friend, but in that family Mrs. and constant friend, but in that family Mrs. Towers was the stronger element. It was her money that supplied the golden oil to lubricate the wheels of wealth, her will that dominated everything. But in spite of all her efforts, her young protege was continually made to feel herself an intruder.

The next day Mr. Marchlands met her in the hall as she came in with some rare white roses, looking, as he thought, like a rose herself.

"I have been up to see Mrs. Towers," said he. "She is very dreamy today."

"Oh, is it not a pity!" cried Flossie.
"I am not so sure of that. If we could all live in a world of our own creation, would it be

He bowed and passed through the door that Collins was holding open. Flossie ran upstairs. "Oh, Mrs. Towers!" cried she. "They say you are so rich. I wish you would buy a picture from Mr. Marchlands."
"Why?" asked the old lady, sharply.
"To encourage him. To help him live."
Mrs. Towers lifted her brows. "Because, you know," supplemented Flossie, "I have been so poor myself, and indeed, madame, you don't know how cruel it is."
"Of course," said Mrs. Towers, "we can't know anything of other people's lives. But, my child," suddenly drifting to a new subject, "I wish you would get that poem of Macaulay's about—about Henry of Navarre and his white plumes, and read it to me. What a thing it would be to have lived in those days!"
So the weeks went on. Flossie and her mistress lived their curious double lives. Clement Mayne and Mr. Marchlands both came often to the house, and still Flossie's gentle heart ached on—for no one said a word about buying the poor artist's work.
"Oh, how I wish I were rich," Flossie thought. Summer Out-Door Life.

AMERICAN people do not live out of doors half so much as they should. Sum-mer as well as Spring and Fall, they stay closely in their houses and miss the good they might have from good they might have from the fresh air and the beauty of the earth. That is one reason the American women lose their good complexions at so early an age. They begin life as fresh colored girls, but by the time they have had two or three children and have kept house, cooked, washed and ironed for a few years, whatever bloom they once had is gone.

Of course, I do not mean to suggest that it is possible for a busy woman to turn her back on her work and wander the meadows and woods

Of course, I do not mean to suggest that it is possible for a busy woman to turn her back on her work and wander the meadows and woods just because it happens to be beautiful weather. But I do believe that there are few women who could not once in a while make time to go out of doors for a day. I am very sure they would be the better for it. The American woman is altogether too unselfish. She is more than ready to give up her own pleasure for the sake of making the members of her family happy. She herself may not be able to find the time for an outing, but she will do extra work that her daughters may have the fun they wish.

While it is right that young things should have their time of play, there are some rights on the other side. The mother has no right to wear herself out in sacrifices for others. She owes it to them as well as to herself to keep young and strong as long as she can.

In order to bring about this state of affairs she should, as I have said, indulge herself occasionally in an outing. To do this the more satisfactorily, with no thought of undone work haunting her, it is well for her to take as many of the family as possible with her. In other words, to get up a family picnic.

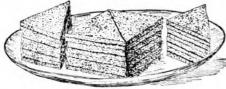

I do not believe there was ever a family in which such festivities as this have been in order where they have not left a very happy memory. I recollect my own childish associations with such outings. One that was held every year took the shape of a blackberrying expedition to a certain plot of ground known as the "Big Piece." To get there was a good deal of an undertaking, for it was along drive, but every year in blackberry time we went there, a big family party. We were supplied with pails and baskets in abundance, for one of the objects of the expedition was to gather enough berries to insure a Winter supply of jam and jelly and canned berries for pie. We children worked hard and the grown-ups worked harder. But it was the sort of thing that did us all good. The hours in the free out doors, the change from the every-d be spent with pleasure. And if a day is too much for the busy housekeeper to spare, an afternoon may be given from work and the family supper eaten out of doors for a change.

The thought of a picnic suggests extra and unusual toil to some people. Naturally, it means a little more work in one or two ways but it also means less in another. After any home party there is always the work of dish washing. There is none of this after a picnic. The little wooden plates in which butter is sent from the grocer's are better than any china for a picnic and the Japanese paper napkins that may be bought for almost nothing are cheaper than the napkins that must be washed after using.

The preparations for the picnic need not be very heavy. A picnic is one of the affairs to which people bring their appetites and there is not much trouble in coaxing them to eat. So the housekeeper need not put in much time worrying lest she may not have dainties that will tempt the members of the party.

There are many good things to eat to take to a picnic and they need be neither expensive nor fussy. Sandwiches, of course, are the great standby and they may be made of a variety of things. The good old ham sandwich has such a place in the affections of most people that it is not easy to supersede. If a little variety is desired it may be made by chopping the ham fine, softening it with a little butter, adding to it a suspicion of mustard and pepper and spreading this on slices of bread. Out of consideration for the tender tongues of the younger members of the party it is well to have some of the sandwiches without the mustard.

Sandwiches are good with the bread divided by a slice of the a la mode beef for which a recipe was given in the last number of "Comfort". Cold roast beef or cold lamb or veal makes good sandwiches.

makes good sandwiches.

If one does not wish to rely wholly upon sandwiches for solids there are other things to take. Cold roast chicken, cut into joints that it may be more easily handled, is always popular at a picnic. Beef loaf is cheaper and very good. So is veal loaf. Hard boiled eggs come in well and if one is willing to take a little more trouble in the preparation, stuffed eggs may be made ready and are pretty sure to be liked by every one.

When it comes to sweets there is no difficulty in deciding upon what to take. Cake, of course.

when it comes to sweets there is no dimenty in deciding upon what to take. Cake, of course, of any kind. Small saucer pies, doughnuts, turn-overs and the like suggest themselves at once. If fruit is needed there should be harvest apples and early pears, as well as the always useful bananas, of which one grows a little tired after a while.

It is a great addition to the enjoyment of any picnic if it can be held in a place where it is possible to make a fire. That opens the way to a host of delightful things. Then it is possible to roast potatoes, sweet or white, in the ashes, to roast ears of corn impaled on the points of long rods, to heat the coffee that has been made at home, or even to have the joy of boiling a gypsy kettle and making the coffee or tea fresh on the spot.

As a matter of course, it is delightful if the picnic may be made to some place where there is something especial to do. It need not be berry picking necessarily, or anything else that is useful. As I said before, it is once in a while an excellent thing to go off with nothing on hand but the business of enjoyment. But this is heightened if there is the possibility of fishing or of crabbing or of crab hunting, or anything else of the kind. Nothing else ever tastes as good as the fruits of one's own efforts in the shape of the fish fresh from the water cooked over the out-door fire and eaten straight from the coals.

I have spoken in large general terms of the number of theirs toget the teaton of the number of the property of th from the coals.

I have spoken in large general terms of the number of things to eat that could be taken on a picnic but it is wise to exercise a little wisdom in choosing the various things that go to make up the bill of fare. It is true that one can eat out of doors without distress things that in doors at the regular table would provoke an indigestion, and even so it is not wise to tempt Providence too far. When simple sandwiches are taken and plain cake one may indulge in a few dainties that are less easy of digestion. But when rich cakes are taken one should be a little careful about pies and other items of the feast, and the things that are to be cooked at the picnic place should determine to a certain extent the nature of the other items of the bill of fare.

mine to a certain extent the nature of the other items of the bill of fare.

Not very much will be needed for the picnic basket in the way of table furniture besides the wooden plates and paper napkins of which mention has already been made. Drinking cups of some sort will be required and it is a pity there is no equivalent in this line to the light wooden plates. Tumblers are heavy to carry and it is perhaps better if one or two of the party have the collapsible traveling cups, to provide cups of agate ironware or even of tin for the rest of the number. A tablecloth to spread on the ground is desirable, and if there are elderly persons in the party there should be a shawl or two to spread on the ground for seats.

BEEF LOAF.

Chop coarsely a pound and a half of lean beef from the round and a couple of slices of fat salt pork. Add to this half a cupful of crushed cracker crumbs, an egg and a tablespoonful of butter. Season the mixture well with a teaspoonful each of salt and pepper and with parsley, sweet marjoram, thyme and a dash of celery salt. Work all well together and pack into a mould that has been well buttered. A brown bread mould will answer very well. Cover the mould closely, put it in the oven in a pan of boiling water and cook an hour and a half. If the water boils away, fill it up. When done, put something flat on top of the meat in the mould, place a heavy weight on it and let the loaf get cold after this. It should stand overnight before-turning out and should be sliced with a sharp knife.

should be sliced with a sharp knife.

STUFFED EGGS.

Boil eggs hard and cut them in two crosswise. Take out the yolks and work them to a paste with melted butter and onion juice or a little chopped ham or tongue. Season to taste with pepper and salt. Put the yolks back into the halved whites, lay the two sides together and twist tissue paper about them, to keep the eggs in shape. In serving lay them in a basket on a bed of lettuce or cress.

ANSWERS TO QUERIES.

AN OLD BACHELOR.—I think it is very hard upon you to have to depend upon your own exertions for bread and I am very glad to give you one of the simplest and surest recipes I know for "plain, common, ordinary, white, light, bread," such as you wish to know how to make.

Sift two quarts of good flour into a bowl with a teaspoonful of white sugar and half a teaspoonful of salt. Heat a pint of milk almost to scalding, stir into it a heaping tablespoon of butter and a pint of boiling water. When the mixture is lukewarm put in it four tablespoonfuls of yeast and stir into a hole made in the centre of the flour. Work this to a soft dough with a wooden spoon, then turn it on a bread board and knead it hard for ten minutes. Put it to rise in a warm corner for six hours. When it has risen enough it should be twice as large in bulk as it was when it was put to rise. Divide it into three equal parts, knead each for five minutes, put each portion into a bread pan and let them stand for an hour before baking. Try the oven by putting in a tiny ball of the dough. If it turns a pale yellow in from seven to ten minutes the oven is ready for baking. Do not open the oven door for fifteen minutes after the bread goes in. A good sized loaf should bake in about three quarters of an hour. The loaves should not be made too large.

For yeast, peel, quarter and boil six medium sized potatoes in two quarts of water. With them put a

For yeast, peel, quarter and boil six medium sized potatoes in two quarts of water. With them put a handful of dried hops tied up in a bit of mosquito netting. The water should be cold when they go in and come quickly to a boil. When the potatoes are cooked soft and begin to break, drain them in a colander, putting the hops and water back over the fire. Rub the potatoes through a colander and while they are still hot work into them two tablespoonfuls of while they are still hot work into them two tablespoonfuls of flour, moistening them with the hop water left on the fire. Squeeze the hop bag over the mixture so as to get out all the strength of the hops. Let all become about blood warm and add to it four tablespoonfuls of good yeast or a yeast cake dissolved in warm water. Put all into an open lar with a wide mouth and leave it in a warm place to work. As soon as the bubbles cease to rise to the surface put it in bottles, cork tightly and keep in a cool place.

MRS. M. J. N., Norcross, Ga.—You ask about dried mushrooms. They must be picked over very carefully, to see that there are no worm eaten or decayed parts about them. Then put them in soak. Overnight is none too long for some of them. They should be laid in cold water. When they have plumped they may be dried on a cloth and used for stewing or sauce or seasoning. They cannot be broiled like fresh mushrooms.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.
Caleb Brett, an aged and prominent citizen of Mansfield village, drew a considerable sum of money from the local savings bank on a certain forenoon and was seen to enter Purinton's mill located near the edge of the village. He did not reappear and later a searching party found his old beaver hat on a slab pile at the foot of a sluice leading from the upper part of the mill. It was considered probable that the old man had come to his death by falling down the sluice. The strange part of the affair was that his body had been removed by parties unknown—admitting the premise that he was really dead. Several persons, his nephew, George Brett, with whom he had been having trouble about the young man's proposed marriage, Arthur Wing, he village printer and an obnoxious suitor for the old man's grand-daughter, Daniel Purinton, owner of the mill and an intending borrower from Brett, were known to have been in or about the mill at the time of the old man's disappearance. After some weeks the sheriff of the county, angered by George Brett's stubbernness and influenced by certain suspicious circumstances in his statements, arrested the young man. At about the same time state detectives, rivals of the county officers, arrested Arthur Wing.) SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

"I AM ALIVE. Y'RS RESPT'Y-CALEB BRETT." HE arrest of George Brett, charged with the killing of his uncle, had attained an element of grim humor due to the ex-citement under which the sheriff was laboring. But the arrest of Arthur Wing for the same crime was cruelly serious. It came about under the following circumstances:

On the afternoon that Detective Ordwell and the sheriff had paid their visit to George Brett with the result that has been related, the two state detectives who had been working on the Brett case were holding a conference in their room at the boarding-house in Mansfield village. With them was a powerper reporter. lage. With them was a newspaper reporter who during his stay in town had been able to form a close intimacy with George Brett by catering to the latter's convivial tastes.

"I believe that George Brett has told me as much as he has told anyone," the reporter was telling the detectives. "He's a fellow that you much as he has told anyone," the reporter was telling the detectives. "He's a fellow that you can get near to when you tackle his whiskey streak. I told him long ago that I was in with you fellows against the county officers and Ordwell. And lately he has been loosening up. He swears that he didn't hurt the old man, himself, though when he gets well edged up he admits that the fact that old Brett has slid out has been a wonderful help. George owns up that he must have been in the mill when the Sanire came in But he says he must have been that he must have been in the mill when the Squire came in. But he says he must have been down stairs looking for him—that is, he supposes he was at the time. He heard a noise that he couldn't understand very well at the moment and when he came up, he says, there was Arthur Wing on the top floor. George says Wing sort of jumped and looked surprised to see him coming up from down below. He hints to me that the queer noise he heard was probably his uncle's body sliding down the sluice."

"You can't build much of a case on guess-"You can't build much of a case on guess-work," said the shorter of the two detectives. "Young Brett may be telling the truth, but considering the position he holds in the case his testimony won't go very far with a jury. We need something clinching before we shall even dare to make an arrest."

even dare to make an arrest."

Deputy Sheriff Jason Dustin who came pudging up the walk just then didn't look very clinching and the detectives who saw him from their window didn't welcome his arrival.

"Here comes that old fool of a Dustin again," said one of the officers. "He wants to tell us how much he hates Sheriff Pettingill and to ask us how much we've found out."

us how much we've found out."
But when Jason burst in on the frigid group it was plain to be seen that something out of the ordinary had come his way.
"Are you fellows still buckin' Hi. Pettin-graciously.

"Then ye sort of figger it's Wing. hey?"

"Uh!" granted the tall detective.

"What if I kin help ye!" Jason leaned forward and his jaws worked excitedly.

"Donno as I'd put myself out if I were you," said the tall detective dryly. "Guess we're gettin' most of the juice out of the case on our hook."

"You don't know that "You don't know what I mean, gents. What if I've dockyments?" Jason's little eyes gleamed with excitement.

"Open up and tell us what you are drivin' at," snapped the short detective. "It's too hot today to guess conundrums."
"I'll tell ye right straight out that I don't propose to give ye this thing for nothin'. It's got to be a fair divide on the reward."
"We don't propose to buy anything till we got to be a fair divide on the reward."

"We don't propose to buy anything till we see what we're buyin'," declared the officer.

"I could scoop this case and the reward myself with the thing I've got," said Jason. "but there's reasons why I don't want to."

"Now look here, Dustin," said one of the detectives, "we don't care to hear over again the story about how Sheriff Pettingill has been rubbin' it into you."

"Wal, ye know he and the county attorney."

"Wal, ye know he and the county attorney have been doin' it ever since this case started," protested Dustin. "I wouldn't give 'em a piece of testimony to save their souls from tophet. But if I don't give this to them, Hi. Pettingill won't reappoint me deputy after his re-election. He's bound to be next sheriff. I'd rather be deputy for another tew years than get the reward. But I want to share with ye."

ward. But I want to share with ye."

"If you've got anything worth payin' for you'll find us square," said the officer impatiently. "Hurry up and get it out of you."

"Ye all understand that ye hain't to tell that I found it," said Dustin. "Ye're to make believe ye found it yourselves and then Pettingill won't lay it up ag'in me because I didn't turn it over to him."

GREAT PURINTON MILL MYSTERY

"Yes, that's all right, but what in the name of blazes have you got?" Dustin slowly drew a big flat wallet from his inside pocket and from a compartment took a folded paper. "Found that on the floor of the Mirror office not an hour ago," he said. "I Mirror office not an hour ago," he said. "I was in there waitin' for a paper to be struck off and Arthur Wing was workin' at the desk. He pushed some papers around and several things dropped on the floor. I reached over and picked 'em up 'cause he was busy and of course I looked to see if they were important enough for him to save 'em. I wasn't pryin', ye understand. Wal, this 'ere paper was one of 'em."

Dustin passed it over to the tall detective who studied it with deen interest dawning in his officer.

"That's what it did." The detective arose quickly, slapped on his hat and said to the group, "Come with me." At the door of the Mansfield bank he halted his retinue a moment while he paid a hurried visit to the treasurer. Then he led the party to the office of the Mansfield Mirror.

"Are the papers out yet, Mr. Wing?" asked the tall detective as the arrivals ranged them-the tall detective as the arrivals ranged themselves around the room.

"I am just reading the last proofs," said the young man. "If you will wait a few minutes the papers will be ready."

"We'll wait," said the detective. Then after after a pause he stooped forward suddenly and pretended to pick up a paper from the floor. "Excuse me, Mr. Wing," he said, "but here seems to be something worth saving." As if by accident he unfolded the paper. Then he started back and began to examine it. All those in the room looked at him intently. Then clinching the paper in his hand he said, "All of you stay just where you are." He hastened from the office and disappeared in the doorway of the bank. He remained out of sight on the stairs a moment and then returned. Now he walked straight up to Arthur Wing and held the paper so the young man might regard it.

"Mr. Wing." said he, "the fact that you were."

Wing and held the paper so the young man might regard it.

"Mr. Wing," said he, "the fact that you were in the mill when Mr. Brett disappeared may not be evidence that you were concerned in his taking off. The fact that you have recently paid off the mortgage on this newspaper plant and refuse to tell where you got the money may be your own business. But how do you account for the fact that I have just picked up from the floor of your office a note running to Caleb Brett from John Bates—a note that the treasurer of the bank says he saw the Squire take away in his wallet the day he disappeared?"

Young Wing's face was white but he said quite steadily, "I certainly cannot account for the paper being found here. I never saw it before."

the paper being found here. I never saw it before."

"As to that, Mr. Wing, we have simply your word against the fact that the paper has been found practically in your possession. Under the circumstances I feel it my duty to arrest you as one having guilty knowledge of the death of Caleb Brett and holding possession of property known to have been on the body of the deceased."

The detective had raised his voice and at the

The detective had raised his voice and at the sound old Meander Wing had shambled in his slapping slippers from the inner room. He held a printer's job stick in his hand.
"What are they trying to do to you, bub?"

"What are they trying to do to you, bub?" he stammered.

"They've arrested me, father. They say I killed Caleb Brett." The young man fairly reeled to his father and grasped his hands. And then despite despairing protests Wing was taken away to the village tavern and confined in a room with the detectives standing guard. They told him that he might have a trial before a local trial justice the next day, if he demanded it. manded it.

manded it.

The officers allowed the young man to receive no one except his father. They had not the heart to refuse him admittance. The two talked till late into the night but the son could throw no light on how that fatal paper happened to be found on the floor of the Mirror office. "I realize in what a position this thing puts me," said the young man gloomily. "I paid the mortgage and I have told no one, not even you, where I obtained the money. But I gave my solemn word not to tell. I will not break my promise. And now this matter of the note from the Squire's pocket-book comes up. It looks bad against me, doesn't it, father?"

"You ain't guilty, my boy—nothing could "You ain't guilty, my boy-nothing could convince me of that," said the old man, "but it's goin' to be hard to make outsiders believe you are all right unless you tell all you know. Hadn't you better say where you got the money to settle the mortgage?"

"I can't break my promise, father," said the young man.

Well, no matter what anyone or everyone young man.

"Well, no matter what anyone or everyone else may think," said the old man when he parted from his son, "you've got your old dad behind you through it all. I'm not so smart as I used to be and perhaps I'm not much of a match for those shrewd city detectives that are trying to put you behind bars, but if you're innocent, my boy, and before God I believe you are, I'll beat 'em, for an old father's love will dig deeper than the hate of enemies."

And yet another love sought Arthur Wing that night and had been turned away. Grace Erskine, veiled heavily, had come to the hotel and asked to see the prisoner. But the detectives turned her away. The detectives knew that Grace and her mother were deeply hostile to George Brett on account of their money and family disagreements and they feared plots, even from the squire's relatives.

That night the two officers slept on cots in the room that young Wing occupied. Twice they attempted to coax a partial confession from him. They insinuated that perhaps he might have dodged from a blow of the old man's cane and that the Squire had tripped at the edge of the sluice. They urged him to admit that the old man had fallen by accident, assuring him that they would assist him in his story, for they only cared to gain the reward that had been offered by the town and the family. But Wing indignantly resented their suggestions and went to sleep.

In the morning Wing demanded a prompt hearing and at ten o'clock he was conveyed to the town hall. The local trial justice conducted the hearing, which was admittedly only for the purpose of ascertaining if there were sufficient grounds on which to bind Wing over to await the fall term of the supreme court.

George Brett was in one of the front seats in the hall. He was supercilious and at ease, apparently. The sheriff, after sleeping on the matter, and hearing the nature of the evidence that his rivals had dug up, feared the effect on his candidacy that would be produced should he continue to press the charge of murder against one so prominent in town as George Brett. Brett had therefore been released under nominal bonds to appear as witness.

The local lawyers offered to take Wing's case but he refused counsel. "I am going into that hearing as an innocent man," he declared. "I don't believe any justice can hold me on the evidence that will be presented. I don't want nearing as an innocent man," he declared. "I don't believe any justice can hold me on the evidence that will be presented. I don't want to complicate my case by legal shifts. I want everything free and open."

And yet, as Wing viewed the crowded hall and gazed into the faces of his townsmen, he knew that he must appear to them in a singuknew that he must appear to them in a singular light, as he pondered on that matter of the paper from the Squire's pocket-book. His heart throbbed as his searching eyes sought out Grace Erskine sitting in the space reserved for

The county attorney brought out the fact from his witnesses that Wing and the Squire had had words on the morning of the fatal day, that Wing had been seen to follow the old man to the mill and then returning soon after had stopped and washed his hands at the brook at the brook.

George Brett described how he had arrived at the mill before his uncle and then later had at the mill before his uncle and then later had found Wing standing alone at the head of the sluice. He mentioned the fact that he had heard a strange sound while he had been in the lower part of the mill and attempted to say that he believed that the sound was the fall of his uncle's body in the sluice. But the justice checked that statement, stating that it was his duty to protect the position of the prisoner from insinuations.

"What you know, sir, and that only," he said to Brett.

to Brett.
But as Brett went on with his statements it was evident that his malicious suggestions were having their effect on a considerable portion of the audience.

Then there followed the more sensational Then there followed the more sensational testimony of the finding of the scrap of paper on the floor of the sanctum of the Mirror office. The treasurer of the bank swore that he had seen the Squire place that note in his pocketbook on the day of his disappearance. The treasurer also stated that the mortgage on the newspaper plant had been discharged a few works hefore. Arthur Wing perior the debt in newspaper plant had been discharged a few weeks before, Arthur Wing paying the debt in

After the county attorney had held a whispered conference with the justice the latter looked over his spectacles rather kindly at Wing and told him that he would not be required to take the stand unless be cared to do

"I wish to do as you think best," said the young man.

"I have no suggestions to make," returned the justice. "Of course the entire object of this hearing is to clear up this mystery. If you can shed any light on it or can say anything to clear yourself we shall be glad to hear from

The prisoner arose and declared that he was ready to answer any questions to the best of his ability. "I don't wish to stand behind any quibble of the law, and being an innocent man I don't see how questions can injure my case." His apparent candor was greeted with a murmur of applause. The county attorney eyed him for a moment and then asked bluntly: "In what manner do you think that paper could have come on the floor of your office?" "I don't know sir." "Did Squire Brett open his pocket-book that day in your place?" The prisoner arose and declared that he was

"Did Squire Brett open his pocket-book that day in your place?"
"I think not."
"You are answering my questions to the best of your ability, are you?"
"Yes, sir."
"You are ready to answer all questions?"
"I am."

"Then where did you get that thousand dol-lars, or over, with which you paid the debt on your newspaper plant?"

The query came like a stone from a sling and

The query came like a stone from a sing and the young man grew pale. His lips worked. At last he said slowly and with manifest embarrassment, "I am under a pledge not to tell." "You understand that Squire Brett had a large sum of money on his person when he disappeared, do you not?" "I do." "You see where your refusel to answer a to give."

"That is both arrant nonsense and contempt of court, your honor," snapped the county at-

A rustle went over the room and the listeners felt that the young man was seriously prejudicing his case. The justice looked at Wing a moment and then with some impatience said, "You can either answer the question, sir, or go to jail for contempt."

Suddenly there was a stir in the direction of the witness seat and Grace Erskine was seen to rise. Her face was crimson but her voice was firm.

"I loaned Mr. Wing that money," she said.

"As I thought my act would be misconstrued by the public under the existing circumstances I asked him to keep the matter quiet. I will say now"—the girl seemed to gain courage and looked around proudly—"that Mr. Wing at first refused to accept the loan, but I insisted because I felt that the foreclosure proceedings were unjustly instituted and ordered by my grandfather and that his family ought to right the wrong."

grandfather and that his family ought to right the wrong."

The faces in the court room expressed astonishment and there were some very significant smirks and winks. That there was an attachment between the young people was well known in the community but no one had supposed that Grace would thus nullify the intent of her grandfather. In the buzz that followed the girl's spirited statement the county attorney asked for a short recess and it was granted. When the session had been resumed the county attorney separated from the treasurer of the savings bank with whom he had been holding a whispered conference. "Your honor," said the lawyer, "the state, under the circumstances, will be obliged to put in a little more testimony than it intended. I will now call to the stand once more Treasurer Brackett of the savings bank. "Mr. Brackett, when Arthur Wing settled the mortgage and paid the interest and charges did you happen to note especially one ten dol-lar bill that he passed to you?"

"I did."

"Why?"
"It had been torn across at one time and had court plaster pasted on it to mend it."
"Why did you especially note this mending?"
"Because I recognized it as some that I had done myself."
"When?"
"On the meaning of the 24th of June legt."

"On the morning of the 24th of June last."

"Relate the circumstances, please."
"Squire Brett pulled the bill out of his pocket and asked me to mend it. Then he put it back into his wallet and started out."

"That was the morning of his disappearance, was it not?"

"It was."

"Have you the bill in your possession?"

"Have you the bill in your possession?"
"I have." The treasurer produced the bank-

"I have." The treasurer produced the banknote.

"You will swear, will you not, that to your best knowledge and belief this bill is the one that you mended?"

"I will. The bill was torn peculiarly and I distinctly recollect it."

The bank note was passed to the justice for inspection and the lawyer arose and made a brief argument. He said that he did not wish to impugn the testimony of Miss Erskine, even though she might possibly be a prejudiced witness. But he delicately hinted at the existence of troubles between George Brett and his female relatives, and that since the marriage of the young man and after his demands for money these troubles had been aggravated. "And you know to what length money matters and family troubles will drive respectable people," he added.

know to what length money matters and family troubles will drive respectable people," he added.

"I will not discuss this phase of the case at length now," he said, "but I simply draw your attention to the fact that there may be reasons why Miss Erskine's statements are not to be considered as conclusive. Affairs of the heart, you know, prey upon the motives of the heart, you know, prey upon the motives of the best of us." The girl's face was crimson and Arthur Wing seemed about to rise and make indignant protest. But the sheriff waved a monitory finger. "And here is this evidence of the treasurer of the savings bank—a bit of evidence that I did not at first intend to produce at this preliminary hearing. Now, your honor, under the circumstances, I can do nothing else than ask that the respondent be committed without bail to await the action of the grand jury at the September term of court."

While the county attorney had been talking, a ragged and small boy had been edging his way up the crowded aisle toward the table of the justice. In spite of muttered protests and of frowns he kept on till he had laid a folded paper in the hand of the judge. An exclamation from the magistrate interrupted the attorney. His honor had opened the paper and scrutinized it. The boy was about to hasten away but the justice put out a detaining hand.

"Where did you get that paper, bub?" he

"Where did you get that paper, bub?" he asked.

"Up in the woods."

"Up in the woods?"
"A man."
"Who was he?"
"I don't know."

"I don't know."

"Did you ever see him before?"

"I don't know. I didn't look at him very hard. He had false whiskers on and I was scared. He said a feller was bein' tried down here for suthin' he hadn't done and told me to give that paper to the judge."

All this conversation was carried on in low tones and the secretary and ittle idea of what tones and the spectators got little idea of what was going on.

The justice beckoned the county attorney to his table. "Look at this," said the magistrate. "What in time does it mean?"

On the paper, scrawled in an irregular hand, were these words:—

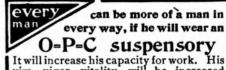

"Mr. J. Benson, Justice:—I am alive and you will hear from me later. No need to make talk about this. Nobody killed me. Make no more trouble for anybody. This was written for me by a friend but I sign my name so that you can see that it is all right.

Yrs respt'y, Caleb Brett."

"That signature is Caleb's all right," allowed the attorney, as soon as he had recovered his breath. "But what——" breath. "But what—"

He looked at the justice with bewildered stare and the justice stared back at him. The spectators in the court room stared at the two. The matter was too big to keep silent. In five minutes the report had buzzed all over the court room that Caleb Brett had written a letter to say that he was still alive. ENTLEMEN, have you agreed on a verdict?"

The silence of the Court-room on that closing hour of the day was intense. It was as if the whole world had stopped moving in suspense, listening to the lanky miner, the foreman of the jury, who strained up from his chair, his face drawn and the red shock of hair gleaming above a brow of ashen pallor. "We have," he said solemnly. The silence of the "Guilty or not guilty, according to the evi-

"Guilty or not guilty, according to the evidence?"

"Guilty of murder in the first degree."

The effect of this announcement was electric. A suppressed murmur ran around the courtroom, accentuated by a sob. The prisoner at the bar—a young man of two and twenty, with a straight figure and head thrown back in an attitude of almost challenging defiance, sank into his chair in a state of collapse, covered his face in his hands for a single instant, then threw himself into a stolid pose, clenching his hands and gazing blankly into the faces of the half-pitying, half-accusing spectators.

The strain was broken by the voice of the grave magistrate. "The prisoner will please rise," he said without harshness.

The convicted man worried his way out of his seat with difficulty, trembling. "Judson Peck," said his Honor, his voice gathering solemnity as it proceeded, "you have been accused of murder, been tried by a jury of your peers, and found guilty of the hideous crime with which you were charged. In cold blood you foully murdered the father of the young woman whose hand you had asked in marriage, and all because he did not find in you an acceptable son-in-law. On the twenty-fourth of May last you visited Israel Bent in his own home for the purpose of pleading for the last time for the hand of his daughter. You found the old man lying upon the couch. Your coming roused him. A violent quarrel ensued. You went away dejected, only to return. You found your victim asleen. Taking the old flintlock from the pegs over the fireplace, you deliberately shot through the heart the man who refused you the hand of his daughter, his only child. Then with deliberation that equalled your cunning, you replaced the weapon the wall and sauntered away to await the discovery of your crime.

"Upon the evidence submitted, sir, I do not see how a fair and impartial jury could bring in any other verdict. The motive for the crime was fully established. While the actual shot.

on the wall and sauntered away to await the discovery of your crime.

"Upon the evidence submitted, sir, I do not see how a fair and impartial jury could bring in any other verdict. The motive for the crime was fully established. While the actual shot was not heard nor the actual deed witnessed, your coming and going were accurately noted, and your return to the house of your victim the second time has not been explained. You have been tried and convicted, and it remains for me to do my duty as administrator of the law. What have you to say why sentence should not be passed upon you?"

The prisoner parted his lips as if to speak, his hands thrown wide as in act of resignation. "What can I say that I have not already said?" he faltered at last. "I swear before Heaven that I was not even in the house of Israel Bent when he was killed. I did not fire the shot. I did not hear the shot fired, and I know of no human being who could have committed the crime. At the hour that Israel Bent was killed I was miles away."

"We have gone all through that evidence long since," said his Honor with a wave of the hand. You have been tried, convicted and are now to be condemned. In order to give you time to meet your Maker, I will not be in any undue haste. By virtue of the authority vested in me as chief magistrate of this court, I hereby sentence you to be put to death in a manner prescribed by law, on the morning of the ninth of October next, and may God have mercy on your soul—"

"Stop—wait! One moment, Judge!"

It was a woman's cry in the solemn silence as a frail figure with eyes burning bright and white hands waving frantically, struggled through the breakers. A discordant buzz ran through the plan as a swimmer plunges through the preakers. A discordant buzz ran through the plan as a swimmer plunges through the preakers. A discordant buzz ran through

"What do you mean?"

"I mean that Judson did not kill my father.

It was a celestial homicide."

"A what?" The magistrate looked dumbfounded. The jury winced.

"Celestial homicide, your honor. Suspend sentence, your honor, I pray you. I will prove it all—believe me—"

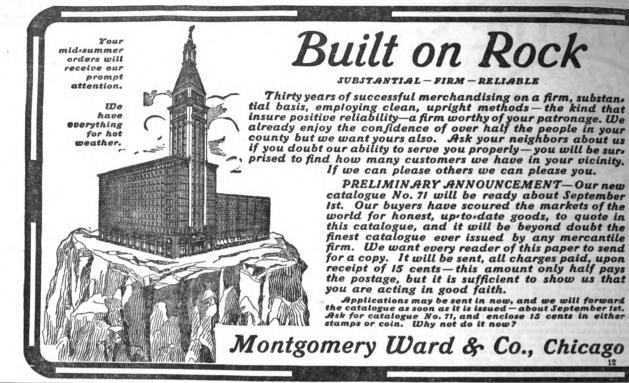

The judge sat dumbfounded.

"I cannot do it here, nor today, your honor. Tomorrow, at two o'clock, in the very spot

"To annot do it here, nor today, your honor. Tomorrow, at two o'clock, in the very spot where my father was found dead, with a bullet through his heart, I will prove to you and to the jury that Judson Peck did not kill him. I have spent night and day over the problem. Only believe me, and I will make it all clear to you. Will you not suspend sentence, Judge to when the life of an innocent man depends upon it?" The words were now melting with pity and pleading.

"It is most extraordinary," answered the magistrate after a deep pause during which he seemed hesitating between fining the interruptor of the court proceedings for contempt, and acceding to her wishes. "But in order that there might not be the slightest danger of hanging an innocent man, in spite of the fact that an intelligent jury has rendered an adverse verdict on the evidence presented, I am constrained to suspend sentence until tomorrow that the Court may give the daughter of the late Israel Bent an opportunity to prove her astounding theory. The Court will now adjourn, the jury to convene promptly at the hour of two p. m., tomorrow, at the house of the late Israel Bent."

"Your honor, I thank you!" The words were cried out in an agony of gratitude, but they were scarcely heard in the uproar that followed the raling of the magistrate who gathered up his documents and hurriedly left minutes with a verdict of "Not guilty." "Mr.

the chamber by a rear exit as one who had completed a miserable piece of business.

The prisoner sat rigid and very pale, following with his blinking eyes the lithe figure waving toward him a triumphant gesture of renewing hope and comfort as she disappeared through the applauding crowds. Then he sank back in a state of semi collapse, murmuring not so softly that his nearer jailers did not hear, "She is mad—on my life Margie Bent has gone stark mad!" Then he relapsed into his usual stolid reserve.

As ordered by the court, the honorable jury, the counsel for both prosecution and defence,

As ordered by the court, the honorable jury, the counsel for both prosecution and defence, together with the stern judge himself, gathered at the appointed time in the little chamber on the first floor of the Bent homestead, semicircled about the very couch where the late Israel Bent breathed his last. Margie too was there, and there was a look of unspeakable confidence in the maidenly face which shone indeed like something fairly inspired. Court being formally opened in this most informal courtroom, the young lady was sworn and asked to give her testimony which she did after the manner of Portia of old.

"Your honor, and gentlemen of the jury," she began in a voice somewhat faltering from emotion rather than fear for her cause, "you have tried and found guilty one Judson Peck for the murder of my father. You have heard witnesses swear that Judson Peck was the last man to see my father alive, that he left the house in great anger, returning again, only to leave the second time a little before the discovery of the crime. You also see hanging over the chimney place yonder the very old fintlock with which the alleged crime was committed, and yonder the couch upon which my father was sleeping, as was his usual wont at that hour of the day, when the fatal bullet entered his heart. "Now, gentlemen of the jury, I beg you to step forward here and draw bead across the sights of that old flintlock as it hangs there and tell me if it is not true that a bullet fired from the weapon in its present position would penetrate the couch on the opposite side of the room at a point about the region of a man's heart were he lying there on the pillows at this very moment."

One after another the jurymen filed up, and with a squint of the eye along the long barrel, admitted the allegation. The judge nodded. "Proceed," he commanded.

"Now, gentlemen," contended the pleader, "having seen that the old colonial relic might have committed murder had it been fired by spontaneous combustion or from any other cause, let me proceed to call yo Warden," said the judge, "you are commanded to return to the jail and release the prisoner charged with the murder of Israel Bent—the man who owes his life to one of the most remarkable refutations of the theory of circumstantial evidence ever presented to a jury. Miss Margie, I congratulate you. You have won the admiration of the Court, and as a reward I trust that you will win back to your heart the man you have so ably defended." Then the solemn magistrate took the fluttering creature in his arms and kissed her, whereupon, releasing her, she fled with eyes tearful with joy like a spirit through the open door, pushing through the cheering crowd and making her way on toward the jail where she could be the first to greet her lover set free by her own ingenuity and labor.

But she was doomed to disappointment. Another strange episode capped the climax of that day of surprises when Judson Peck, the instant the great black doors were closed behind him, struck out across the field and into the wood to the by-path which led to the railway station. There, before he could address or be addressed by a single person, he managed to leap aboard the flying express to New York as it slowed up before a crossing, and was never seen again.

Overwhelmed at this unaccountable act, the fair Portia of Driggston locked herself in the old home where she speedily grew gray and listless to all pleading and applause, and where she is to this day, the woman with a secret. For not one soul on earth other than herself ever knew that a letter in a strange handwriting came from over the sea some ten months after the strange disappearance of Judson Peck on the day of his miraculous deliverance from

It is not necessary to quote it at length, but the closing paragraph is significant:

"Of course my heart is all gratitude, my dear Margie, for your deed of heroism in my behalf, and it was certainly worthy of a greater reward than a coward's flight. But, dear one, how could Iremain there, possibly to become your husband, when I knew in my heart that I was a guilty man?

"You shudder, and no wonder, Margie. It is true that I was miles away when the fatal shot was fred, as I swore on the stand. But had it not been for me your father would be alive today. I was a fool—I was led away between my anger and my love for you, but I have lived to repent—Indeed, I shall spend the rest of my life in atonement, even though I never see your face again. Margie, in the name of heaven, keep my secret and pray for me. It was I who first discovered the strange fact that the concentrated rays of the sun passed over the flashpan of the old flintlock. It was I who, returning to your father's house after the quarrel, found him asleep, and with my own hand moved the weapon along the pegs so that a few minutes later the hot rays should fall upon the fatal spot. Sprinkling there a few grains of fresh powder, I stole away, leaving to the powers of heaven the fulfillment of the terrible deed. And so, good byforever, Margie. Keep my secret for the love which you bore one so unworthy of you, and may heaven bless you. Farewell!"

ART ווחוח KIUH TABLE COVER FREE. Armenian Needlework Designs So Closely Followed

as to Defy Detection.

Rend How You May Get this Splendid Japanese Gift for Your Own Home. The most gifted race in the world with the needle are the Orientals. For centuries the rich and varied designs worked by their hands have been the admiration and delight of chinery that would reproduce these rich designs of embossed embroidery and needlework, even to the delicate films of gold-thread work. Still more curious the Japanese obtained plans and made similar machinery, and that they have the addition of "cheap labor" to Yankee machinery. In this way the most delicate Armeina and Turkish needlework is imitated so closely that none but the expert, on close examination, reveals the minor points of imitation.

An Art Table Cover Free. We wish to introduce Oxien Nazone Salve into thousands of new homes and to accomplish this intend to actually give away these rich and ornamental Table Covers to our friends. We shall send a handsome cover, about two feet and a half square, of the richest and most pleasing designs, and being in appearance like the hand-made covers that Armenian experts sell for from $12 to $25 each, to one agent in each city or town who will sell for us only two boxes Nazone Salve at 25c. apiece. Veracious Records of the Doin's in the Cobb's Corner Postoffice, "Writ out" by the Boy Behind the Counter.

Roy Behind the Counter.

[EDITOR'S NOTE. The quaint philosophers, the dry wags, the shrewd dickerers and the eminent yarn-spinners of the countryside make a forum of the country postoffice when there is room at the rear around the big stove. The stories and incidents on which some of the most successful human interest novels of the day are constructed come from the quaint loungers around the stores in Yankee communities. These official records of "Jeth's Crowd" are to be taken down month by month for the readers of "Comfort," and we hope that as you become acquainted with the members of the "Congress" your interest in their discourse and stories will deepen.

In the September number of "Comfort" the "Cobb's Corner Congress" will continue sessions.]

NCLE Wack Spofford and Teed Strout of Cobb's Corner Cracker Barrel Congress found Cap'n Jote Bailey comfortably en-sconced in the shade behind the postoffice, in the summer quarbehind the postoffice, in the summer quarters of the Congress. The plantain leaves grow rank here and are cool to the old men's feet. When they start for home through the August sun they put some of the leaves in their hat crowns, and Sol's glory is tempered to the bald skull. "Cap'n got his singthe bald skull.

"Cap'n got his singin' streak on today," said Uncle Wack as he

"Phin Fyleses' fool heerde his grand-pop say Old Scratch was a-fishing for Skinch Gray. For to catch Skinch Gray did he lay in wait With an old bunged cent hitched on for bait. —Hitched on for bait an' a good staout string Goin' jigger-jigger-jigser just to flop the thing. 'Canse Old Scratch knowed that Skinch Gray Grabs evy ny nimble conner that comes his way. Grabs ev'ry nimble copper that comes his way.

Hi-diddy-di, as sure as Fate Ye can't get fishes 'less ye use right bait!"

"Wonder where Cap heerd that song?"
mumbled Teed as the two old men hung up at the corner and listened for a moment.
"Guess it must be one that he has made up about old Gray," said Wack. "Cap's quite a rhymester, and I heered tell that old Gray stuck him on a shote trade last week and made Cap hoppin'. Reckon he's gettin' back at Skinch."
Cap'n Jote pronged his chew farther back in his jaw with his tongue and then went on with his lyric.

"Phin Fyleses' fool got a bung-down cent
An' off to old Skinch Gray's he went.
Fust up then daown past Gray's he shined
An' the bung-down cent bobbed on behind.

"To jedge from that song that ye're singin' 'bout old Gray ye don't think that he will be givin' any public lib'ries to Cobb's Corner right away, Cap, hey?" chuckled Uncle Wack as the two new arrivals eased themselves down on a laddler canted up against the side of the Skinch Gray! Why, if granite lib'ries were goin' three for a quarter Skinch Gray wouldn't give a scantling pig pen."

"Well, he is rayther near, for a fact," acquiesced Teed Strout.

"Near!" echoed Cap'n Jote. "Clus! He's so tight-skinned that he don't dast to wink reel hard for fear of stretching the skin on his feet and hurting his corns. He's bald-headed because he begretches juice enough to feed his hair."

"Yes, I did heer tell that the shote he sold ye wasn't up to snuff," said Uncle Wack signifi-

The Cap'n bridled. "'Tain't that," he snorted. "I tell ye right now there can't a man in this town screw me on a trade. I knowed what the shote was before I bought it.

I jest wanted to see how mean Skinch Gray was and I let him git the shote off on me." "Coor'osity satisfied, I hope," said Wack, dryly. It was evident that neither he nor Teed dryly. It was evident that neither he nor Teed accepted the explanation of the shote trade. Cap'n Jote understood that his excuse was a lame one and he hastily went on. "'Tain't on account of myself that I felt like dippin' into old Gray. But he abuses ev'ry one that has anything to do with him. Can't nobody work for him to save their lives from tophet. The last hired man he had has ran away, or suthin'. He left all of a sudden and didn't even take his clothes. Reckin he felt as though he couldn't get away quick enough. Prob'ly he got so thin on the grub that Skinch has been givin' him that he stubbed his toe and fell into a crack in the barn floor and is layin' there like a knittin' needle, waiting to be pried up."

"That hain't the way of it," declared Uncle Wack. "I s'pose I'm the only one in the place that reelly knows jest what become of that hired man. It's a master cur'is case."

His face was so solemn that the two looked

"Dew tell!" they ejaculated. "Ye're hectorin', hain't ye?"

"Naws'r," snap snapped Uncle Wack with emphasis. He reached down into his trousers' pocket, stretching his leg like a huge rooster coming out of a dust-heap. He drew out a coming out of a dust-heap. He drew out a black and thick plug of tobacco and labori-ously gnawed off a good-sized chew. Then he settled himself to narration.

"I had noticed for quite a while," he said,
"that Gray's hired man was gettin' more peaked and more caved in, but I didn't think it would get to the pass in which I see'd him."
Uncle Wack paused impressively.

"Nothin' 'specially wrong, was there?" Teed inquired apprehensively.

"Jest ye wait till I tell ye," continued Uncle Wack. "Ye'll never see that hired man on earth no more. Hain't that

"Sho!" murmured the two listeners in subdued and awestruck chorus.

"No, ye won't," said the narrator. "The day before that hired man disappeared that hired man in Erskine's and the man and the same that hired man in Erskine's and the same that hired man disappeared that hire I was down in Erskine's field gettin' some live bait out of the brook. After that he sort of sighed and took a look around. And then gettin' a good, tight grip on the straps he commenced to h'ist. Swan to man if he didn't rise right off that limb and go sailin' up."

"Didn't know he was so staout," said Teed.
"Staout nothing!"
yapped Uncle Wack, "that wan't the idea at all.

to hold myself on the ground. I've come to the conclusion that it will be easier to h'ist myself up and have done with it 'cause I sha'n't have strength to hold to the ground much long-er.' And off he went till he growed to just a little speck and then he disappeared. Talk about flying machines that this 'ere Santy Doodle has been gettin' up! They hai'n't in it with that hired man." Uncle Wack paused and chewed a moment reflectively.

"Where d'ye s'pose he went to?" asked Cap'n

"Reckin the critter went right up to Paradise jest's he was," said Wack. "A man that could live tew months on the kind of feed that Skinch jest's he was," said Wack. "A man that could live tew months on the kind of feed that Skinch Gray sets out is near enough to an angel for all practical purposes."

The meditative silence of the little group was broken by the explosive clearing of a throat. The postmaster stood in the back door.

"Bror-hum-m!" said he, "was that Skinch Gray's hired man ye was talkin' about?"

"That's the feller," said Wack.

"You say he has gone for good?"

"As Artemas Ward would remark, 'He has wentedest from these 'ere parts.'"

"Well, ye hain't posted on the latest news," said the Postmaster. "I see him and talked with him only yesterday."

Uncle Wack, who saw his lie called in this surprising fashion, had no word to say. "Yes, I saw him," continued the Postmaster. "He was jest comin' back on his way from Paradise, and called here to see if any mail had arriv' for nim. He was on his way to tophet to get a writin' from the Old Boy. arriv' for him. He was on his way to tophet to get a writin' from the Old Boy. He said, Jim did, that if he could show that he had spent tew months at Skinch Gray's he wouldn't have to go through Purgatory. And he told me one mighty surprisin' bit of news." The crowd looked interested. "He said," continued the Postmaster, "that he got into Paradise for about tew hours and was allowed to look around a leetle. An angel took him in tow and around a leetle. An angel took him in tow and showed him the soul room. I didn't know it before, but the hired man tells me that they have a different way of arrangin' matters up there from what I had supposed. Every soul on earth has a duplicate soul stored in Paradise, and the duplicate soul grows smaller or larger jest as the man conducts himself on earth. If he does good to his feller men the soul up there grows, and so the angels in charge are able to keep tabs on each critter. Now, Jim says to me that when he was showed around, the angel took him into the storeroom where all the souls are kett. After he had exwhere all the souls are kept. After he had ex-plained to Jim about how the system was run Jim asked for a look at the soul of Skinch Gray. Skinch was pretty much in Jim's mind at the time. The angel called up an attendant and asked to look at the records. After he had run down the index he turned to a page in the book and asked to look at Soul Number Umpty Trillion, Dickety Three, or suthin' of the sort.

"After a little time a box was handed to him. "After a little time a box was handed to him. The angel opened it and inside was nested another box. The angel opened that and another box still was nested inside. The angel kept openin' and openin' and still the boxes grew smaller till at last he came to a box that Jim said was sartin the smallest box he ever see. Nothin' could be smaller and have a cover. Coarse black hair indicates power of character with a tendency to sensuality.

Straight stiff black hair indicates coarse, strong, rigid and straightforward personality. Fine hair generally denotes exquisite sensibilities. Flat, clinging straight hair, a melancholy, but constant habit.

Harsh, upright hair is the sign of a reticent and sour spirit, a stubborn and cruel character. Coarse red hair is accompanied by strong

The opening chapters of this intensely interesting story appeared in February Comfort. Back numbers may be obtained by enclosing three cents to Comfort, Augusta, Maine, for each number

During the past year portions of Indian Territory were opened to settlement by the Government allotment of lots by chance, and the scenes that were enacted in the years gone by when Oklahoma was the objective point of settlers from east and west, north and south, were again presented in a much more axciting manner. A Kansas telephone girl luckity secured a lot valued at $11,000, and others were nearly as fortunate.

Because of the exciting events that have transpired in Oklahoma and Indian Territory, events that have attracted the attention of the whole country, the story of "Ned Todd" is presented to our readers in the hope that instruction and entertainment may be derived from its perusal.

CHAPTER XVII.

A TOILSOME JOURNEY.

HERE is trouble at the cabin, come on."

HERE is trouble at the cabin, come on."

This voice one of the fugitives recognized as belonging to a man who had always been his enemy.

"There, do yo hear that?"cried a voice not over fifty paces in his rear.

In a moment the youth was upon his feet, running for life. But he could still hear the loud angry tones of the road agents in the rear. When they came to the cabin, and found the two guards slain and the prisoners gone, their rage knew no bounds. The woods rang with wild whoops that would have done credit to a band of Apache Indians.

Hurriedly as they had taken their flight, the youth had not neglected to possess himself of the rifle and pistols of one of the fallen road agents, and Ned Todd the border detective had seized the other.

Archie Holland had also taken the precaution to possess himself of one of the deadly bowie largers which ene of the slein guards had care.

ried in his belt.

It was very dark, and the fugitives despite all their caution were continually running against trees, or stumbling over sticks, and doing a hundred different things that were likely to bring them to the notice of their pursuers.

"Let me walk, I can walk now," said Daisy.

"Hush, not yet, you are too weak," whispered Todd, who was nobly and bravely making his way through the almost impenetrable darkness, carrying the girl in his strong arms.

Ned knew that she was weaker than she herself supposed, and that having been bound so tightly she would find her ankles stiff and sore.

After they had gone at least a nile, it was thought safe to halt a few moments to regain their breath.

thought safe to hait a few moments to regain their breath.

"You need not carry me any further," whispered Daisy again. "I assure you that I am perfectly able to walk."

"We will rest a moment," Todd answered, "and then you may try. But you will find your ankles weaker than you think them. I have been in similar circumstances."

Their purposers could be heard not half a mile.

been in similar circumstances."

Their pursuers could be heard not half a mile away, and the fugitives knew by their manner that they were mad and furious.

"It was well that I came when I did, or you would have been taken away from the hut, and then it would have been more difficult to rescue you. Captain Snell had just gone after the horses and was coming back."

Ned Todd spoke in an undertone, for he knew not how near the road agents might be. His companions made no answer. Every

At last the tramping of feet could be neard on their right, and our party made a complete change in their course. The cardinal points of the compass were lost to them, owing to the darkness of the night.

They turned to the left, and had followed this new course for about two miles, when they again became alarmed by the sound of voices directly before them.

It looked to Archie as if after all they would have to fight. They were both armed, and he believed that they would have a fair show of victory.

"How many are they in number?" he whispered to Ned Todd.

pered to Ned Todd.

"I do not know, but I believe that they are at least a dozen. Perhaps more. We can do nothing with them in a fight."

Archie heaved a sigh. Would they never get beyond the clutches of these villains?

They were again forced to change their course, and in the darkness became so confused that even Ned Todd with all his skill in wood-craft was not certain that they were not going in a was not certain that they were not going in a was not certain that they were not going in a circuit.

For an hour the trio had silently groped their way along in darkness, and through what would seem to be an almost impenetrable jungle. At last Todd, who was in the advance, halted them by his hand.

All stopped and listened.

A horse could be heard champing his bit, and restlessly pawing the earth. A moment later and they could hear some one yawn, and then a voice spoke in the Creek language.

There was no answer. No one but Todd understood the Creek tongue. It was fortunate for them that he did, for by listening to what the guard said, he learned that he was alone.

Putting his lips close to Archie's ear, he whispered:

"Stay here for a moment. There is a chance for us to get horses."

The youth understood him, and pressed the hand of the girl, which he had all the time held hand of the girl, which he had all the time held in his own.

Then they became silent, and Todd disappeared as noiselessly as if he had melted into air. He had been so long on the frontier that he was thoroughly educated in wood-craft.

Several moments elapsed, and then those who were waiting heard a sound of scuffling. It was not a very loud noise, and it was soon over and all became silent. Moments dragged slowly by, and Archie and his fair companion were growing a little uneasy, when they heard a voice near them say:

"All right. This way."

Both moved in the direction of the sound, and pressing their way forward through bushes and darkness, at last ran against a man. "Here we are," whispered Todd. "Horses plenty for all and to spare."

They did not ask him what had been done with the Creek guard, for they knew too well that the darkness was a screen to a scene of horror.

that the darkness was a screen to a scene of horror.

Groping his way forward, and feeling about with his hands Archie found a horse, and he proceeded to shorten the stirrup on the left side so as to make it tolerably comfortable for a lady. Fortunately Daisy Miller had been long accustomed to riding on horseback, and was no novice, or she might not have been able to maintain her seat on this spirited little mustang.

Archie Holland then found another horse for himself, and mounting, rode to the side of the trembling girl.

"Wait a moment for me," said Ned Todd. "I have another little job of liberating to do. Unless we cut these horses loose, we will have the road agents like a pack of sleuth hounds on our trail."

He went about among the horses, cutting the

He went about among the horses, cutting the halters of all that he could find, and then did his best to stampede them.

They turned in the opposite direction from which they supposed that the cabin was, and galloped away through the woods. Trees grew scarcer, and after a few moments' ride the underbrush almost allogether disappeared.

scarcer, and after a few moments' ride the underbrush almost altogether disappeared.

Another hour passed and nothing was heard of their pursuers. Then Ned Todd drew rein and said they would take a rest.

"We must have some sleep, you two especially. You are not made of iron, and unless you get a little rest you will break down. It still lacks several hours till daylight, and we can do no good travelling tonight. Better rest."

Daisy was sure that she could not go much

Archie assisted her to alight. The moon had by this time risen, and the forest was growing lighter. The youth cut some leafy boughs and made her a neat little bed, on which the tired girl threw herself and was soon buried in deep slumber.

"Now make another, and go and do likewise," said Todd, who had taken up his place by the side of one of the horses.

"And leave you to do all the guarding."

"I got a fair night's sleep while a prisoner last night" he answered. "That will do me."

Archie was so exhausted that he only threw down a few boughs and then lying down upon down a few boughs and then lying down upon them fell asleep.

When he awoke he found it daylight. He started to his feet and gazed about upon the forest. About ten paces away was Ned Todd, his eyes fixed upon some object that was moving about in the woods. He had his thumb on the lock of his rifle, as if he was half inclined to send a shot at the object.

"What is it Ned? Why did you not waken mo?"

"It's not necessary," he answered. "I don't think it's anything but Oklahoma Peg.".

As he spoke the form of that mysterious woman could be seen coming out of the woods

"Yes, she has been signaling me for the last ten minutes."
"And see she is coming this way."
"So she is."

"Of course.

"Of course."

Peg came up at a rapid walk. Despite the fact that she was dressed in a half-civilized costume, and that her dark face was made rough and darker from long exposure to weather, Peg still retained some of her remarkable beauty, which a few years ago had made her the belle of the plains. She occasionally cast an uneasy glance about her, as if she was not sure that she was not being watched by some one in the thicket.

"What do you want?" demanded Ned Todd, as she came where they stood.

"I came to talk with you," she answered.

"Well, what is it you have to say?"

"Why don't you leave the country?"

"That is just what we are trying to do, Peg. We would have been out of it several days ago if we could have gotten out. Can you give us any points that will enable us to leave here?"

"Go to the boomers' camp, they are fully two hundred strong, and Snell and his cut-throat road agents will not dare harm you there."

"Where is the boomers' camp?"

"On the Canadian. All you have to do is to follow the river and you will find it. The way is long and very rough, but you can find it."

"Where is Snell?"

"He is ten miles north of here. You com-

"Wait one moment, Peg, allow me to ask you a question," said Todd, laying his hand upon her arm to detain her.

"What is it?" she asked.

"You know what we came here for?"

"I have heard it said, that it was probably your object to find a man that was missing."

"It was."

"But for her he would have still been mine," cried Peg.
"What, what do you mean?" asked Todd, on whose mind a new truth began to dawn.
"He was mine before he saw her, and her face stole his heart from me, and now I have to wander alone in the forest. He saw her, and he killed and stole for her."
"It was not her fault, Peg," Todd replied. "She hates him, and would go away and never see him again if she could."
"But if you linger here he will find her, and then I shall lose him." Her great black eyes flashed with a strange fire. Todd knew just how to manage her and said:

Can't you tell us something about the white man who is a prisoner in the forest of Oklahoma?"

She bowed her head a few minutes in silence. Evidently there was a struggle going on in her heart. After a full minute she answered:

When breakfast was over they once more mounted and started on the long tedious journey down the river. It proved to be a longer journey than they had supposed.

The sun rose over the river bank and filled the valley with floods of golden light. Here and there a timid deer or antelope could be seen out on the prairies, or valleys, nipping the grass, and halting to sniff the air at their approach.

Daisy was sick and weak, the long strain upon

Daisy wassick and weak, the long strain upon her nerves had been exhausting, and she was certain that she must soon succumb. The youth rode at her side and whispered words of encouragement in her ear.

Noon came and they halted for another rest. Nothing had been seen of their pursuers this morning, and the fugitives began to breathe easier. But as they got farther away from danger, and as there was less cause for effort, the reaction began to set in, and Daisy was scarcely able to ride.

While they were allowing their horses to rest at noon, she lay almost helpless upon the grass.

"Then what would you have me do? Goaway and abandon you?"

"Then what would you have me do? Goaway and abandon you?"
"Yes. I will only be an incumbrance to you," she answered.
"Never! When you are abandoned, it will be after we have yielded up our lives."
She fixed her large beautiful eyes upon him with a look of gratitude, and said:
"It is no use for you to lose your lives on my account. If I must die, why need you? I can last but a very short time anyway. Helpless women have been abandoned before in this wilderness and allowed to perish, and why should not I?"
"If they were abandoned it was because there were not men with them, only creatures calling themselves men. We will never abandon you."

She sighed, but there was a grateful look in her eyes. Raising her head she gazed over that boundless plain, and groaned: "Oh, will this long tedious journey ever come to an end?"

A RACE FOR LIFE. Ned Todd waited as long as he dared, and then the horses were brought around and sad-

Daisy was asked it she thought she could ride alone.

"I will try," she answered cheerfully. "The rest and food have greatly strengthened me." Archie lifted her to the back of the easiest going pony, and leaping upon another started away, following the great winding river. All that day they continued their flight. It was just growing dusk, and they had entered a thick wood that grew along the banks of the stream, when Ned Todd, who was lingering in the rear, discovered a dozen horsemen coming over the hill toward them. It needed only a glance to tell him that it was the road agents under their determined leader.

"He is like a sleuth hound on our trail," the borderer thought. "Well, there must be no rest until midnight, at least. They will not but the moon would not be up before midnight. Their horses went clattering along on the wooded ridge, about two miles from the river. All along the ridge was a dense wood.

Suddenly, from the side of the road, there came one of the most unearthly piercing screams that had ever fallen on their ears. Daisy uttered a shriek and her horse, frightened, leaped forward and went thundering along the road at a break-neck speed.

Archie Holland knew that scream. It was like the one they had heard but a few nights before. His own horse kept pace with the girl's, and a moment later he was alongside of her. There was a rush of air, a heavy swishing sound and a thud, as a body struck the horse on which Daisy was riding. Daisy was riding.

Another unearthly scream, and a pair of flery shoulder by the strap, and he did not make any attempt to draw it, but snatching his pistol, leaned forward, thrusting it past Daisy's breast and almost against the head of the monster, that was clinging to the rearing, plunging horse, and fired.

The strupping report so clear to the strupping strupping to the strupping strupp horse, and fired.

The stunning report, so close to the head of the frightened girl was too much for her, and she swooned.

The panther lost his hold and fell to the ground, and Archie Holland drew the insensible girl forward upon his own horse.

His bullet, more by luck than marksmanship, had gone to the brain of the ravenous beast. Ned Todd, who was just behind him, had drawn his own pistol, and as his horse leaped over the writhing and struggling animal, he sent another bullet into its body. Though Daisy's horse was fearfully lacerated by the beast, it still continued to run along by the side of the other horses. other horses. "Is she hurt?" asked Ned Todd.

"I don't know, I hope not. I can see no place where the beast's claws have torn her."

"Then she is very lucky. I never knew a narrower escape."
"Won't those shots bring the road agents this way?"

"Won't those shots bring the road agents this way?"

"It may; we will change our course."

Taking the lead, Ned Todd turned off at right angles from the ridge path, and again entered a pathless forest. The night was too dark, he knew, for them to follow them.

"We will throw them off the trail, and then get a night's rest," he said to himself. "When morning comes we will be prepared for another day's journey."

Ned knew that they were not many miles from the camp of the boomers, and if they could only get one more day's travel they would make their escape certain.

It was many minutes before Daisy began to show any signs of recovering. Archie Holland was growing uneasy about her, when she heaved a sigh and began to move. It was too dark in those woods for him to see her face. He at last spoke to her, and asked if she had been hurt by the panther's claws. The answer was very feeble, but it was satisfactory. She had received no injury save the shock.

"We will have to halt here and wait until morning," said Ned Todd. "I think that we will gain nothing by going on tonight, for we have been driven out of our course."

and require some rest as well as the others."

"But this is no time to think of sleep," the ranger answered. "The road agents are not a mile away."

"How do you know?"

"I have heard them."

"Then these shots were heard by them?"

"Yes,"
"Well, Major Todd, further travel tonight is wholly out of the question. We will have to make a fight to the death if they should find "That is about the size of it," returned Todd.

The hours wore slowly on. Frequently during that trying night, the road agents were so near that they could be plainly heard. Archie kept close to the sleeping girl, his rifle in his hands and his revolvers at his side. At one moment their pursuers seemed coming directly toward them, and then they turned and went in some other direction. other direction.
"Ten to one they stumble on us before morning," whispered Todd, to his younger com-

"They seem never to tired. But it will be an unlucky day for them if they run across us."

Archie wondered that their horses did not make some poise that would then the test.

Archie wondered that their horses did not make some noise that would betray them. It was doubtless owing to their state of almost complete exhaustion, that they did not.

Long and dreary was the night, but morning dawned at last. The sky had become overcast with clouds during the night, and again they were threatened with a drenching rain.

Daisy awoke considerably refreshed and strengthened by her sleep. A breakfast, of all that remained of the cold provision, greatly added to her returning strength.

"Have you heard anything of the road agents in the last hour?" Archie asked.
"No, I think they are entirely at fault. They lost the trail in the night and it is no easy matter to find it now."

"How far do you suppose we are from the boomers' camp?" "It cannot be far. We will mount and push on without delay, I know that it cannot be over ten miles, and we must reach it before noon, or we will all be at the mercy of this gang of ras They mounted their horses, and once more started on their way toward the camp. Having wandered some distance from the river during the night, it became necessary to take a southeastern course.

Daisy's horse was slightly lamed, doubtless having hurt its foot, or sprained itself, in its struggle with the panther. They were compelled to go slower on that account.

The sky was cloudy, and in the distant west there was an occasional rumble of thunder. "We are going to have a storm," said Ned. "I hope that we will reach the camp before it

They halted in the thickest, deepest part of the grand old wood, and Archie lifted Daisy to the ground. Her horse had kept alongside of the others, and when he came to examine its injuries, he was glad to discover that they were not so great as he had at first supposed. The claws of the beast had stuck into the sad-

"I will, good-night."

"Then those shots were heard by them?"

"I think when we reach the top of this hill we can see the boomers' camp," the border detective said.

They were even then ascending the slope, and in twenty minutes were on the top, where they could overlook a long stretch of valley before could overlook a long stretch of valley before them.

"There it is, there it is!" cried Ned Todd, pointing toward a snow bank of tents and wagon covers, about six miles up the valley. At this moment the sun peeped through a rift in the clouds, and fell in all its glory and splendor upon the valley below. Oh! how peaceful, how like a haven of rest and safety seemed that camp. From their elevated position they could see men, women and children moving about. They could see the framework of two or three houses, for the boomers had determined to build themselves a town. Men were busily engaged everywhere about the camp.

"How long will it take us to go there?" asked Archie.
"With our tired horses, it will take almost an hour," answered Todd.
Another hour in the saddle, another hour of toil, and then they would find rest. Archie turned in his saddle and gazed at the clouds gathering in the west, and wondered if the storm would stay away until they had reached shelter. Turning to Daisy, he asked:
"Do you think that you can stand another hour in the saddle?"
"I will try," she replied.
But now as they look again along the narrow path they will have to travel they see a sight that fills their breasts with alarm. Three or four white men are seen to ride out from a

"The infamous scamps!" hissed Ned Todd through his clenched teeth.
"Do you understand that? What does it mean?" Archie asked.
"They have secured the aid of those Cheyennes to help them, and they either intend to attack the boomers or cut off our retreat. We've got to make a bold dash for it, or we will never make it, and there must be no delay."

Fortunately they had not been discovered, and Ned wheeling his horse back, galloped down the hill, the others following.

The youth looked to the great scout for advice in this trying ordeal. That personage reined in his horse as soon as they were out of sight and said.

"We're in a desperate strait, and it will take desperate means to save us. Are you willing to run a hazardous risk?"

"I don't think that we can take any greater chances than we have," Archie responded.

"But this is such a dash as we have never had. We will literally have to cut our way through the enemy, or we shall be lost."

"We can but die, and death is preferable to captivity with such a gang of villains."

Daisy nodded assent.

"We can but die, and death is preferable to captivity with such a gang of villains."

Daisy nodded assent.

"Come on then, right down this ravine," cried the borderer, and wheeling his horse about, he went thundering down the ravine with the others close at their heels. By keeping down in the ravine they were enabled to get within two or three hundred paces of the nearest Indians and road agents. Here he halted, and turning in the saddle, said:

"It is not more than three miles and a half from here to the boomers' camp; I will ride out upon the hill, fire at the Indians and road agents and draw them on after me, and then you and Daisy make for the camp just as fast as your horses can go."

"And you, what will become of you?"

"Oh, never mind me," returned Todd. "I shall be able to get away from them."

With a cheerful smile he wheeled his horse about and went skimming up the hill, until the top was gained. He had got within two hundred paces of the group of agents and Indians, who were waiting for them, before he was seen. The sharp report of his rifie cut the air, and away he went with the howling, yelling monsters after him.

"Now is our time," cried the youth, and he and Daisy made a bold dash toward the camp. The boomers see them, so do the road agents. A dozen men cease to chase the borderer to follow them.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT.

HERE have been wonderful improvements during the past twenty years in all science and arts. Probbably nothing has advanced more rapidly however, than photography. And even an amateur in this art even an amateur in this art in this day has to be very proficient to claim even that title.

Constantly discoveries are being made with regard to the camera itself as well as in the methods and materials employed in printing the pictures.

Not so very long ago artists in this line depended wholly on the sun's light, and a cloudy day to a photographer brought an added reason for melancholia. But now, some of the best prints and the prettiest effects are obtained from the arc light, or gas or even ordinary lamp-light. lamp-light.

To look back into medieval times.-the very To look back into medieval times,—the very first camera was in the form of a small dark room where an early philosopher allowed the light to enter through a very tiny circular opening, throwing the exact but reversed appearance of the objects without on a white screen within.

Then a Neapolitan philosopher placed in this opening a convexleus, below which he fixed a mirror, making a camera obscura. Following this was an experimental period, and it was recalled that the ancients found certain chemicals. this was an experimental period, and it was recalled that the ancients found certain chemicals the sun would work upon and create a change. A man by the name of Priestley got the first sun print of any value by coating a glass bottle with chloride of silver on which he marked letters. But the photographic image was captured by Taguerre and Niepee who together experimented and finally got results on a polished plate coated with iodized silver. This was gradually developed by fumes of vaporized mercury and finally arrested (or fixed) by a bath of hypo sul. of soda. The daguerreotype as we have come to call it, was the original plate converted into the picture; of course this made photography more of a luxury than it has been since pictures have been produced from the original plate.

But all this was too inanimate to satisfy. Pictures are well enough, but the call was to make them live and move. And from toy land came the first suggestion in the little "wheel of life" which was a cylinder in whose sides were cut verticle slits through which could be seen pictures of figures on a sheet of paper in various stages of motion. By rotating this cylinder the objects appeared to move. But these pictures were from wood cuts and were too crude to be used outside the nursery. Experts worked on gelatine plates to get the movements smooth, but not until 1887 in Edison's these pictures were from wood clus and were too crude to be used outside the nursery. Experts worked on gelatine plates to get the movements smooth, but not until 1887 in Edison's Laboratory at Orange, N. J., was this perfected.

W. K. L. Dickson arranged a band of sensitized film connected at each end which is propelled inside a camera by an electric motor from without, while a shutter opens and closes emitting a ray of light at the rate of forty-six times a second. Subjects, exposed to either the glare of sunlight or twenty arc lamps with reflectors (amounting to fifty thousand candle power) go through their motions while the camera is storing up impressions. This film is then developed and fixed and is then ready for public use.

One M. Plateau, a blind man, was the first to exhibit "living pictures" through a magic lan-exhibit "living pictures" through a magic lan-tern though his were not taken from life, being tern though his were not taken from life, being merely hand painted on plates. Later an Englishman was quite successful in getting pictures of animals moving. He had a number of cameras connecting with threads which crossed (at different points) a race track toward which the cameras pointed. And as the animals would race by, the threads would jerk open one shutter after another, thereby getting the different attitudes of the animal. But this was difficult as glass plates were all that was was difficult as glass plates were all that was then known. With celluloid all those difficul-was difficult as glass plates were all that was then known. With celluloid all those difficulties vanished.

The Edison arrangement previously mentioned composes the camera and the projecting lantern. Both are similar. The former takes in daylight on a rapidly revolving celluloid ribbon. The latter transmits artificial, electric light.

electric light.

The camera has two spools; on one is wound some fifty feet of celluloid ribbon sensitive to light. By turning a crank the operator causes this film to travel on to the other spool, having stopped fifteen times per second between exposures. And thus results a series of pictures each a trifle different in appearance. After developing (by rotating wound film in bath) any number of positives may be made and precisely the same means are employed for projecting the pictures on screen or sheet. Were the negative the picture it would be too great an expense. The film costs originally thirty shillings and developing three pounds more. However, since many rolls are reproduced and (if taken of a celebrity in a parade for example) may be easily sold to be exhibited in different parts of the country—this of course defrays the heavy expense.

The American Biograph is the finest yet produced and is considered so the world over. Still another method has been devised by electric light.

produced and is considered so the world over. Still another method has been devised by which we are to be entertained, and more picturesque results accomplished, in colored moving pictures.

The means adopted are surprisingly simple, The means adopted are surprisingly simple, the original photograph being taken in much the same way as for ordinary biograph reproduction in black and white. But there is one essential modification. A regulation biograph camera is provided with a shutter that has one opening. As the shutter revolves, a snap-shot is taken every time the opening comes in front of the lens. In the modified instrument the revolving shutter has three openings, so arranged as to meet the lens at equal intervals of time, and these openings hold tiny panes of glass—one red, another green, and a third blue-violet.

These, of course, are the three primary colors which together make white, and upon this fact the theory of the instrument is based. When the biograph camera is in operation, in obedithe theory of the instrument is based. When the biograph camera is in operation, in obedience to a well-known law, the exposure through the red glass "takes" only those parts of the objects in view that happen to be of a red color; likewise, the green glass only takes green, and the blue-violet glass only the portions of corresponding hue. Obviously, then, all three exposures are required to compose a complete photograph. photograph.

Accordingly, the result of the process is a film-strip consisting of partial photographs in sets of three, each trial making a whole one.

Does your head ache? Is your appetite bad? Do you have night sweats? Are you losing flesh? Are you pale, thin and weak? Do you have ringing in ears? Do you have hot or cold flashes? Is there dropping in throat? Is the nose dry and stuffy? Have you a coated tongue?

Any or all of the above symptoms are cured by the Slocum System of Treatment. The system consists of Four Preparations, illustrated above, which act simultaneously and supplement each other's curative action. The ailments of women and delicate children are speedily relieved and cured.

EDITOR'S NOTE.—The New Slocum System of Treatment for the cure of Tuberculosis, Consumption, Lung troubles, Bron-chitis, Catarrh, General Debility, a Run-down System, and nearly all the ills of life, is medicine reduced to an exact science by the world's foremost specialist.

By its timely use thousands of apparently hopeless cases have been permanently cured. and express address in full. For reproduction before an audience, the strip is run through a machine in the ordinary way, but with the interposition of a revolving shutter just like the one already described, with three openings containing red, green and blueviolet glass. So rapid is the passage of the strip that the eye of the observer does not have time to get rid of the red sensation before the green and blue-violet ones come along, and the three together "justify" optically in such a manner as to reproduce all the color effects of the original scene photographed. Even the most brilliant street-views, with bright costumes of women; or grass, flowers, and sky in country scenes are perfectly represented.

The inventors of this process are two Englishmen named Lee and Turner, who have also patented it in this country. For reproduction before an audience, the strip Taste in Dressing.

EAUTIFUL clothes do not spring into existence by magic. They are the production of not only physical labor, but mental effort, a bit of ingenuity, and a large quantity of taste in combining colors and shades, to be in harmony with the figure, complexion and hair. A girl of the blonde type should study well what color of material blends with the fair complexion. The well what color of material blends with the fair complexion. The new blues and pale greens would be more becoming. The dark coffee-colored hue of the Arabian laces is certainly stylish and attracts, but should not be worn by the pronounced brunette. As in every new fad there is a rise and fall, and those who have noticed it know that the dark lace will in time give place to the white, which is always the safer and more becoming to every type.

Many there are who have the opportunity to dress well, but are entirely ignorant of the subtle art of dressing in taste. Clothes are, to a certain extent, expressions of character. Trimming and its arrangement add an attraction to any gown; then why not combine harmony in color? Let each note of apparel send out a tuneful melody, so to speak. Arrange the coloring and shading to combine in sweet accord. The summer gowns, which are overburdened with inappropriate and unwashable trimming, and a quiet and diligent study of them should be made, removing all such obstacles as impede the good taste which should be displayed.

While a combination of soft and harmonious shades would fill the heart of every true lover of pretty garments with admiration for the wearer, whose mind could so easily conceive of

The vivid hues of the rainbow, in all the soft, thin fabrics of the present day, should be handed over by the "young" old ladies to the daughters and granddaughters and black and white, can be made so daintily and in so many becoming ways, with laces and insertings. The bodice, also, may be trimmed the same way, with a few additions of fine tucks and rows of inserting. The thin, gauzy materials, as a rule, are exceedingly becoming to older women, but not the brilliant colors.

coming to older women, but not the brilliant colors.

A great deal of "worldly" happiness depends on the wise expenditure of money for dressing. The mysterious art of taste in gowns and their adaptation to hats and gloves and wraps, should be cultivated by every young miss, as well as the more elderly matron. The fair, auburn-haired girl, should pass on to her brunette sisters the reds and pinks, all shades of yellow and brown, gowning herself in the daintier colors: blue of every hue; purple, from the darkest pansy to the lightest lavender of the aster; greens, from the dark bottle green to the Nile tints; and always white, and black, or any shades of gray. All these shades can be combined in different costumes to blend in the most perfect harmony with the complexion and hair. Shaded lavender flowers may combine with cream lace on a cream-white hat. This must be worn with all white, all black, or lavender gowns. Blend on a black hat, with dark velvet ribbon, bunches of shaded green leaves from the very lightest to the darkest shades; or use instead the lovely tints of green shades; or use instead the lovely tints of green chiffon.

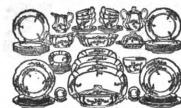

On the other hand, take the brunette of rich, dark complexion. A brown hat trimmed with clusters of shad-

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Mrs. J. K. L., Silverlake, Wis.—Silk is not an absolute necessity for the lining of your thin gown. It is an encouraging fact, that a lining of fine lawn will answer every purpose, whether it be of the same color or in different colors. (2) All the new muslin gowns are fluffy around the feet; frills of all widths and styles finish the bottom of skirts. A pink linen gown can be made a brilliant beauty by an elaborate embroidery done in white linen floss, the embroidered design shaping the circular flounce. The entire front of waist done in the same pattern, and sleeves also. It can be stamped in a graceful design of white morning glories; if desired only the cuffs of the sleeves, and high standing color may be embroidered to match the skirt. White linen waists, every kind of linen for wearing apparel are most desirable. These waists can be embroidered in black rings all over the fronts in black wash silk, or in yoke effect, on rows beginning wide at the shoulder graduating to a point at the belt, collar and cuffs finished in like manner. The bishop sleeve can be used with pointed cuff and embroidered belt in the rings would be a novelty in good taste.

Miss Daisy, Nokesville, Va.—"How can I go to the Springs, without any new clothes?" The outing gown of cream white serge of last season may be used by trimming in fancy braids; or in stitched bands of the same covering each seam, and a short jacket could be added with revers of pale blue silk. The very indispensible, and all important white linen must be made over, with bands of blue linen, embroidered in white half circles; a blue sailor collar can be added with scattering half circles; a tre of blue and white silk is a smart finish. The skirt must have a circular flounce of blue, with embroidered half circles in white also, or a flounce of the white linen, with the embroidered bands of blue. This unique and quite dainty gown can be worn with the white rolled rim sailor hat. The green straw hat can be made quite becoming by removing all trimmings, wipe it carefully with a damp cloth to remove all the dust; trim with a bunch of green shaded ribbons; to be worn with all black foulard gown, that must be made over also; freshen it by removing trimming, and wipe off gently with alcohol; alter by the latest patterns, immerse all the chiffon frills in gasoline and press; do not use any chiffon on the skirt. You will have sufficient goods to use tiny ruffles of the foulard on the skirt, as many as the goods will allow. The waist may be elaborately trimmed with the chiffon in any becoming manner; real simplicity in gowns is no more. The chiffon forming the full puffs of the sleeves, below the elbow. Remove the white silk braid from the nun's veiling; clean with gasoline, stitch on a cluster of five rows forming a pointed design all around the bottom of the circular skirt. ## Why Not Own a Celebrated Fountain Pen? IT'S FREE.

A Great Chance for Bright, Smart People.

How many times do you suppose during the year you have needed a pen and ink and have searched high and low when all you could find was a little old stubby pencil? When you wish to write a postal or letter you may be obliged to jump up and go into the next room after pen and ink or if in the street have to go in a man's store and borrow pen and ink to sign a check, deed, mortgage or any paper where law is the question. Why not be up to date and own one of the Celebrated Fountain Pens which are always ready at a moment's notice? They are conveniently carried in the pocket at all times, are ready at a second's notice, and safely hold about two weeks' supply of ink. Our Celebrated Fountain Pen is made of hard rubber with cap to prevent leaking and the latest principle of self-feeding. The price is always from $1.00 to $3.00 for first-class fountain pens but you can today have one without cost.

We are anxious to advertise our Celebrated Oxien Nazone Salve, the only perfect cure for Asthma, Hay Fever, Deafness, Catarrh of the Head, Eczema, Itching, Salt Rheum, Bites from Poisonous Insects, etc. We will send three large boxes to the address of any responsible person who will sell them for 25c. a box and return us the money, 75c. Upon receipt of the same we will forward absolutely free of cost one Celebrated Fountain Pen. This is a valuable proposition to any one who may be fortunate enough in reading this advertisement as all that is required is a few moments' work with honest intentions. Address your letters to

MORE THAN A BILLION DOLLARS AWAITING OWNERS

Most of It is English Money, and Many of the Heirs are in America.

OU could do almost anything with the amount of money that is lying about unclaimed in England, says the London correspondent of the New York Press in a recent issue. There is more than a billion dollars' worth of it deposited in all sorts of places: in the British Treasury, in the Chancery vaults, in hundreds of banks and in the coffers of countless private companies. There it is, waiting for its owner, or his heirs, growing greater all the time—and in almost every case its custodians are making periodic attempts to discover the persons whose property it is.

The names of such unwittingly lucky people, advertised for in 1900, when collected and printed in small type, filled a straight column in the Times the other day, and many of the advertisements of that year have a distinct American interest. Here, for instance, is $30,000 held for James E. Higgins, who was last heard of in New York; here, too, is "a large sum of money," waiting for the heirs of Joseph Sullivan, formerly of Cork, and later of San Francisco. One John Scott, who fought in the Rebellion, is entitled to money in trust here, and so are J. H. Cock, who left England for America in 1873, and Mary Wriggley, who got married and then went to live in "the States."

QUARTER OF A BILLION IN BANKS ALONE.

went to live in "the States."

QUARTER OF A BILLION IN BANKS ALONE. The fact that the unclaimed millions in Great Britain are distributed among so many different departments of the Government and of the business world probably explains why no real estimate of their total amount has ever been made. How staggering such a figure would be can be guessed when it is said that a reasonably sane calculation of the unclaimed funds lying in banks alone is somewhat over $250,000,000. Of course this estimate takes no account at all of the money in Chancery and those sums of which the government takes charge—the property of those who have died intestate—to say nothing of all the unclaimed dividends on Government and company bonds, unclaimed soldiers' and sailors' prize money, and so on.

The extent of the treasure lying in banks is easily explained. Strangers call and make one casual deposit, never to be seen or heard of again, having, perhaps, been killed or obliged to make tracks out of the country without losing any time. Some banks, after making continued attempts to find these missing depositors, calmly add the sum to their assets, but most houses keep the accounts open and the money waiting year after year.

In Chancery there is now over $400,000,000 in cash and property, of which some $5,000,000 is awaiting claimants. A part of the simple surplus interest on this huge amount in Chancery was used in building the stately Royal Courts of Justice, on the Strand, in which the Chancery Court now holds forth. In 1831, too, Mr. Gladstone borrowed no less than $200,000,000 to apply to the national debt, but it isn't always safe to do this on the ground that the unclaimed money included in the amount borrowed is never going to be demanded anyway, for in 1891, the Chancellor of the Exchequer remarked in his financial statement that he had been called upon "quite unexpectedly" to provide $500,000 to satisfy the demands of heirs and other claimants who had suddenly popped up.

It is true, too, that the next of kin to the owners o QUARTER OF A BILLION IN BANKS ALONE.

THE NEXT-OF-KIN AGENT.

THE NEXT-OF-KIN AGENT.

It is just possible that the appearance of these heirs may have been due to the efforts of the alert next-of-kin agent. He spends his time in hunting up the heirs of property that really exists, and sometimes succeds in unearthing them after years of work, during which he has performed prodigies of shrewdness. His library helps him a lot, and an odd mass that library is, for it comprises hundreds of old directories, domestic and foreign, old court guides, peerages, long records of births, marriages and deaths, school and college lists, etc., etc. One next-of-kin agent has also a wonderful series of cards, millions of them, arranged in alphabetical order, so skillfully and comprehensively that it is hardly possible to name any man of the slightest consequence, providing he lived since 1750, about whom this remarkable reference library will not reveal something.

A FORGOTTEN AMERICAN FORTUNE.

A FORGOTTEN AMERICAN FORTUNE.

A FORGOTTEN AMERICAN FORTUNE.

Oftentimes this class of agent makes it his business to hunt up the heirs to unclaimed dividends in old, old companies that were worse than failures for years, but which finally yielded up small fortunes in returns. One of these was a company formed to operate in the Thirteen American Colonies in 1741, called the West New Jersey Society. A London goldsmith had ten shares in this company, and the subsequent history of these shares looked upon as worthless at the time, was a thing to wonder at. In 1756, when the company was dissolved, there was a dividend on those shares, but their owner was dead and there was no one to claim them. So the money, which amounted to $625, was invested in Consols, and after a century had passed it had grown to $35,000. Not long after, one of the goldsmith's descendants, spied out by the active next-of-kin man, put in a claim and got the money. Another next-of-kin agent discovered, a while ago, that there were funds unclaimed since 1722 in a London company. Thirty-five shares stood in a woman's name, and the sleuth determined to find her "heirs and assigns." First he found a record of her marriage, then of her death; and then got track of the relatives who had survived her, finally working down to her living "next-of-kin," who proved to be a Magistrate, and some poor workmen living in Wales, who finally divided the inheritance, some $40,000.—New York Press.

For the enlightenment and benefit of its subscribers, COMPORT has inaugurated this department under the title of COMFORT'S AT HOME LAWYER, wherein will be carefully and correctly solved any legal problem which may be submitted. All opinions given herein, will be prepared at our expense by eminent counsel.
Law suits can frequently be avoided by timely and judicious advice concerning matters in dispute; this, however,
can only be done by one who is fully conversant with his or her legal rights and privileges. This department will also prove of great value and interest from an educational standpront, as in it will be answered any proper legal question that may be propounded.
Inasmuch as it is one of the principal missions of COMFORT to aid in upbuilding and upholding the sanctity of the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to diovere.

Any wearly subscriber to COMFORT divine and title of the content of the content

FORT to aid in inputitionally have been allowed to the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to divorce.

Any yearly subscriber to COMFORT fully paid in advance is velcome to submit inquiries, which, so far as possible, will be answered in this department. If any reader, other than a subscriber, wishes to take advantage of this privilege, it may be done by sending twenty-five (25) cents, in silver or stamps, for an annual subscription to COMFORT thus obtaining all the benefits which our subscribers enjoy including a copy of the magazine for one year.

Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any legal question, privately mailed, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing the same to "THE EDITOR, COMFORTS ATHOME LAWYER," Augusta, Maine, and in reply a carefully prepared opinion will be sent in an early mail.

Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons seeking advice in this column but not necessarily for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

M. A. D.—Even though a son should claim a homestead in the property purchased with the father's pension money, it would not avail the son as a means of defeating the father's right to recover his money, as explained in this column in the June number of Comport. The fund—no matter how it be expended or what be done with it, belongs equitably to the father and the son will, as a matter of law, be regarded simply as a trustee and compelled to render a full and true accounting of the fund in question. Even though the son "secure the homestead"—as you put it—the money or the avails thereof, can be followed and be subjected to the father's claim.

L. L. R.—The fact that the original deed to the property was lost does not deprive the rightful owner of the title thereto. A deed is simply evidence of title, and not the title tiself. I would advise you to record the deed at once; then clear the title by buying up outstanding tax titles, of which there are probably some, and bring an action against the present occupants, if any, for possession of the land.

action against the present occupants, if any, for possession of the land.

C. G. H.—The fact that you had a book of formulas copyrighted does not deprive you of the right to sell them singly or in any other way you may wish to handle them. The copyright protects you in the ownership of the book and the contents and you can use such ownership in any way you may choose.

M. T. B.—I assume that a homestead entry is the subject of this inquiry. When a lady has made such an entry there is no law preventing her marriage and if she continue to comply with the law as to residence and cultivation, she may perfect the entry and receive patent in her married name. If, however, her husband has also an unperfected entry, both cannot be perfected, as but one residence can be maintained.

M. O. H.—You are not entitled to a pension under the forms which you state. You rendered your country no service, except by way of good example and precept by your enlistment. You have neither morally nor legally any right to pension money.

H. A. L.—I. There is no law to prevent a person from staking out a mineral claim on his homestead. It would seem useless however to do so, as the land already belongs to you in any event, provided you have fully proven your homestead by compliance with the legal requirements in that behalf.

2. You cannot be prosecuted in law for taking an assumed name provided, of course, that you are doing nothing unlawful. A man has a right to call himself by any name he chooses, an assumed name however may cause great complication and litigation in case any property rights are involved. Such a course is very unadvisable.

C. R.—The term "fully pald stock" signifies that no assessment may be levied on it by the Company; that is, if advisable.

C. R.—The term "fully paid stock" signifies that no assessment may be levied on it by the Company; that is, if the Company sells the stock for 30 cents—or any other price less than the par value—it cannot subsequently call on the purchaser for the difference between the price paid and the par value. However, under the laws of many of the States the difference can be collected by creditors of the Company in case the Company becomes insolvent or for any other reason fails to fully pay its debts.

insolvent or for any other reason fails to fully pay its debts.

Miss E. V. H.—If you have any rights in the farm concerning which you write, you ought to have a guardian appointed by the Court in your County having jurisdiction over the property and estate of minors. Under the facts as you relate them, your claim to the property is extremely doubtful. No land can be tied by will for more than three lives; as the property originally belonged to your grandfather, you cannot claim under his will. If you have any legal interest in it whatever, it must rest on your grandmother's title.

Mrs. A. W. N.—It would be a very difficult matter to run down the title to the property in question, unless you can give either the legal description of the land or locate it with some degree of certainty. The editor of this column happens to be somewhat acquainted in the locality where the land is situated and will take pleasure in writing to a lawyer at Russhville—the County seat of Schuyler County—with a view of enlisting his aid in recovering the property for you.

R. K.—A discharge in bankruptcy will relieve you from all debts that existed at the time the bankruptcy proceedings were instituted. Subsequently acquired property cannot be taken by creditors who had notice of your petition in bankruptcy.

N. C., Cedar Bluff, Tenn.—No kissing until you are engaged. (2) An honest girl can no more become engaged to marry more than one man than she could marry more than one. And when she is engaged to one she has no right to flirt with others.

Dreamy Isaura, St. Mary's, Ohio.—Some men are not given to much love-making and calling of pet names. If your lover is that kind, you will have to make his good qualities count for more. You talk, however, like a girl who is much too young to be engaged.

Nora Bell, Oddessa, Ont.—Take the young man you like best and let the other one go.

Onae, Mattoon, Ills.—Chicago ought to be the nearest place, but I do not know the address of any Missionary School. Ask any of the ministers in your town. That will be the easiest way for you to find out.

Mrs. Thomas Cook, Macgregor, Manitoba.—We should say that Vermont was not a good place for a farmer, unless it was one that had lived there always and knew all the conditions and was possessed of the true Yankee thrift. In New Hampshire, which is next door, there are any number of abandoned farms which can be had for almost nothing. For particulars of these write to the Secretary of Agriculture, Concord, N. H., for pamphlet. You could find much better fruit-growing land in Michigan, a great peach country, and much nearer to you than Vermont is. Still if you know Vermont at all and like it, you might get a farm there that would be very satisfactory to you. CONDUCTED BY REGULUS.

HIS year the Sun obtains the first point of the celestial Balance or the sign of Libra at about 47 minutes before seven in the evening of the 23rd of September. Aries ascending gives Mars as ruler of the scheme. He is found in the 5th house of the figure opposed by Jupiter in the 11th house. Saturn is unfavorably placed and nearly stationary in the 10th house, or the house of honor and executive authority. The Moon is on the cusp of the 3rd house just past the opposition of Herschel from the 9th and square of Venus in the 6th house. The Ingress occurs in the 6th house in square with Neptune in the 3rd but applying to a favorable aspect of the great benefic Jupiter and the warlike Mars.

The indication of the figure could not be more favorable for the peace and welfare of the nation than it is, but Jupiter's oriental position, notwithstanding the detriment he suffers from Mars, gives confidence that the right will prevail and the Nation as a whole continue its onward march of progress and command the respect of all nations. The significators of the people, under excitement, indicates a restlessness and some degree of turbulence among the people, especially those whose avocations take them under ground or into the manufacturing and mechanical trades. Some element of disorder will be apparent among fireworkers and employees of great corporations. The opposing rays of Mars are some drawback to commercial morality. Banking and manufacturing affairs are not in as satisfactory a state as could be wished, especially through September and November. Some financial bubbles burst during this quarter and the money market will be in an unsettled state. Political excitement will run high and bitter denunciations and dishonest appeals to popular prejudices be unhappily indulged in by party leaders, which may result in some violence and disorder. September is likely to witness some unusual fire losses among schools and places of public entertainment, or public buildings. Herschel on the 9th indicates some changes in clerical ma

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR SEPTEMBER, 1902.

SEPTEMBER I—Monday. An excellent day for mental exercise and for the literary pursuits in all branches, but especially so for all scientific matters and business concerned with metaphysical and religious afairs; have nothing to do with real estate or writings pertaining to the same in the late afternoon.

Pertaining to the same in the late alternoon.
2—Tuesday. The very early and the very late hours are to be preferred over the middle part of the day; have no transactions with railway or steamboat officials nor expect any favor from government employees; use the evening for negotiations relative to houses or lands or for dealings in agricultural products or lumber.

or for dealings in agricultural products or lumber.

3.—Wednesday. This day is peculiarly appropriate for commercial transactions of magnitude, also literary engagements and the initiation of literary and scientific undertakings of magnitude; unusual mathematical work, and trade and traffic of all kinds; push all trades connected with machinery, hardware, chemicals and drugs; make compounds and mixtures of ingredients in which chemical action is an important feature; deal in electrical goods and sharp instruments of all kinds.

4—Thursday. Fully improve this day for thy transactions with banks and monied institutions; open new stores; purchase goods for trade; urge collections and solicit money advantages; the afternoon is best for dealings with organizations of men or corporate bodies and for business pertaining to patents, trade-marks, or copyrights, also for transactions with persons noted for eccentricity of habit or dress.

centricity of habit or dress.

5—Friday. Enter into no contract concerning real estate on this day; avoid thy landlord and postpone thy dealings with the aged; give no offence to thy superior or employer, nor seek advantage from persons in authority; unless on guard during the evening quarrels and contentions are likely; so have care in this respect and be not oversensitive to mental slights or sarcastic utterancés.

6—Saturday. Give preference to the forenoon for the most important ventures of the day, but do not make purchases for trade or have any dealings with banks or persons of wealth, nor expect much success in making collections or obtaining money accommodations; see that losses do not come through thine own neglect or correlesses.

carelessness.

7—Sunday. An excellent Sabbath day in which thine associations with the aged will be specially pleasant.

8—Monday. Be active and diligent in the pursuit of thy business; travel; change residence and make beginnings in ventures concerned with machinery, mechanism and manufacture; deal with cutlers, surgeons, chemists, bakers, barbers, tailors, cattle-traders, tanners, carpenters and military men; consult thy dentist and experiment in chemistry; urge all literary undertakings.

ment in chemistry; urge all literary undertakings.

9—Tuesday. Be early at thy post and push commercial and literary matters to the fullest extent; use the forenoon for speculation in stocks, if thy nativity likewise favor; beware of government officials and expect no favor or advantage from corporations of any kind; strange quarrels are provoked in the evening and night hours when violence of passions are likely to give increase to crime; avoid all chances of harm from fire and crease to crime; avoid all chances of harm from fire and works of decoration or adornment.

10—Wednesday. Begin this day early and improve every moment in the pursuit of art, music, and in all the elegant avocations; deal in fancy goods and engage in works of decoration or adornment.

11—Thursday, The early morning is the best part of the day, but as the day advances put a bridle upon the tongue; expect but little civility from railway officials or employees, and shun money-lenders and persons who display strange peculiarities of dress or manner; deceptive appearances and baffling hindrances are likely in the transactions of the later hours in all classes of literary engagements or in dealings with persons in such callings. Make no new beginnings or be deceived by flattering promises in schemes offering themselves in this and the following day; do no contract making nor any important correspondence in the afternoon.

12—Friday. The forenoon is fair for general busi-

12—Friday. The forenoon is fair for general business, but the day as a whole is not likely to show much progress in undertakings of consequence; make no beginnings nor have any dealings in lands, houses, mines, or products of the earth.

13—Saturday. Give preference to the forenoon for the major transactions of the day in all general matters, though the day does not offer much encouragement that success will attend thine efforts; have care in the evening in handling all inflammables and explosives and look out for frees, which during the middle days of the month are likely to prove unusually violent and destructive of property.

14-Sunday. The day abounds in benevolence, be-ing especially conducive to religious fervor and partic-ularly inviting religious exercises; efforts of the clergy will be attended with more than ordinary success, and church matters and officials are favored in an eminent degree.

13-Monday. Actively pursue thy several avocations during all this day, giving preference, however, to the forenon for dealings in real estate, boots and shoes, wool, lead, coal and all kinds of building material.

16-Tuesday. Defer matters of much importance in SEARS, ROEBUCK & CO., Chicago. III.

the artistic and literary pursuits in the forenoon, when also all decorative work pertaining to houses or lands or furnishings of any kind should not be done; make no engagements of a money character during the day.

17—Wedeseday. Conflicting influences prevail on this day and more than ordinary circumspection should be exercised in all thine undertakings of much magnitude; indeed, a little procrastination at this time will prove more salutary than unwise. Reduces particularly charges those who claim this as the anniversary of their birthday, or who were born about the 28th of April, 31st of July, or 31st of October, of past years, to exercise unusual care in all matters of health and finance, especially the latter; such persons should avoid litigation and keep out of controversies of all kinds, where it is possible to do so; many such, who have remarked a tendency to blood troubles and heart afflictions are likely to now experience more than usual annoyances in their hearts' action and should avoid excitement and unwise induigences of the appetites.

18—Thursday. This day encourages the mechanical and the chemical pursuits, also dealers in cutlery, military men and generally those whose avocations are conducted by use of fire, machinery, and sharp instruments; make purchases for trade in the middle hours of the day when also deal with banks, manufacturers, and the wealthy classes.

19—Friday. Use the early morning for dealings with wealthy classes.

19 Friday. Use the early morning for dealings with corporations and government officials, but beware of any literary work or agreement pertaining to lands or its products; sign no leases, mortgages, deeds, or any writing obligating thyself financially; have no dealings with persons employed as trustees or in a fiduciary capacity; be not deceived by misrepresentations or false appearances.

persons employed as trustees or in a fiduciary capacity; be not deceived by misrepresentations or false appearances.

20—Saturday. Pecuniary losses are among the effects induced by the prevailing conditions of this day; so be thou careful that thy purchases are prompted by necessity rather than for profit or self-gratification, and defer all speculative inclinations until a more propitious time; and continue thy watchfulness against losses by fire in these middle days of the month.

21—Sunday. The conditions of this day are not important, though the afternoon and evening church service will be more interesting and successful than those of the morning.

22—Monday. Begin early and improve every moment of the day particularly for money ventures and money accommodations and obligations; buy goods for trade and deal with officers of monied institutions, judges and those engaged in the ecclesiastical callings; seek favor for advantage from thy employer during the early morning hours.

23—Tuesday. Musical and artistic pursuits and the elegant occupations generally suffer peculiar annoyances and embarrassments for a few days and the gentle sex appear at a disadvantage or suffer in greater proportion than usual; strange matrimonial alliances are probable at this time, particularly between youth and age, and elopements are prompted by prevailing conditions. Be in no haste to effect engagement or marriage on this day; let all persons born about the 9th of March or June, or the 12th of September or December, of past years, be particularly guarded in diet and habits at this time, especially avoiding stimulants and excitements and be cautious in all their social engagements and in their pursuit of pleasure.

24—Wednesday. The middle hours of the day are the poorest for progress in business matters and forbid particularly are the poorest for progress in business matters and forbid particularly are described.

hours are good for correspondence and literary and mental works; the afternoon gives improvement in every direction.

25—Thursday. Fair for those employed in the fine arts and in the manufacture of articles which gratify and please mankind; musical, dramatic and social engagements are favored to a limited extent, but in all these matters quite a degree of caution should be exercised for a short season, as indicated; have nothing to do with real estate matters in the afternoon or evening nor make any engagement pertaining to improvements of buildings or furnishings.

26—Friday. Make no contract in the morning and be very careful in the use of the pen and in matters of account and mathematical work; important correspondence and literary work is best postponed for a short season; the evening and night hours are peculiarly vicious for fires and losses from unexpected chemical action or explosions.

27—Saturday. The day is evil in many respects, being promotive of disputes and contentions and exciting evily disposed minds to acts of treachery and violence; it will be well if fires have been guarded against during the preceding 48 hours for the passing days have been peculiarly mischievous in this respect. Merchants and bankers should transact business in the early hours with more than the usual caution and losses of valuables and money looked out for.

28—Sunday. An excellent day for the improvement of the mind and for proper appreciation of merits of literary and scientific productions; pulpit efforts will be eloquent and effective and church matters be favored in an unusual degree.

29—Monday. Drive thy business vigorously on this day, especially if concerned with the mechanical pursuits or manufacture.

30—Tuesday. Thou shouldst rise with the Sun to best improve the benefic influences which prevail on this day for all manner of elegant pursuits; improve every moment with thy painting and all musical matters; the time favors the buying of silks, fancy goods and all articles of adornment; for workers in wax, embroi

HEIRS WANTED For More Than BILLION DOLLARS

The London correspondent of a New York daily paper recently called attention to the fact that there is a very large amount of money in England for which no owners have as yet been found. He said:

"You could do almost anything with the amount of money that is lying about unclaimed in England. There is MORE THAN A BILLION DOLLARS worth of it deposited in all sorts of places, in the British Treasury, the Chancery vaults, etc., waiting for its owner or its heirs, growing greater all the time—and in almost every case its custodians are making periodic attempts to discover the persons whose property it is.

"The names of such unwittingly lucky persons advertised for in 1900, when collected and printed in small type, filled a straight column in the TIMES the other day, and many of the names have a distinct American interest. Here, for instance, is $30,000 held for James E. Higgins, who was last heard of in New York; here, too, is 'a large sum of money' waiting for the heirs of Joseph Sullivan, formerly of Cork, and later of San Francisco. One Joseph Scott, who fought in the Rebellion, is entitled to money in trust here, and so are L. H. Cock, who left England for America in 1873, and Mary Wrigley, who got married and then went to live in the United States."

Through its London office "COMFORT" has for some time been making investigations into this subject, and it has procured from the British Government an official list of the Funds and Estates for which the Heirs or Next-of-Kin are wanted. For the benefit of its subscribers and others "COM-FORT" has had these names arranged in alphabetical order and put into a little book entitled "COMFORT'S LIST OF HEIRS."

In addition to the names of persons to whom funds stand to the credit of in the Court of Chancery as reported to the House of Commons by the Paymaster-General, "COMFORT'S LIST OF HEIRS" contains a list of persons who have been advertised for in the United States, Great Britain and other countries during 1901—2. Thousands of persons living in the United States, and in fact all over the world, have been and are being advertised for to claim money or property, and very large amounts are awaiting the claims of the persons advertised for, or their Next-of-Kin, Heirs and Legal Representatives. As these advertisements in most cases appear but once or twice and in one or two papers only, they are never seen by the persons interested, who are in consequence entirely ignorant that they are entitled to any money or property. "COMFORT" has already on file thousands of these advertisements, and a list of persons advertised for will be found in "COMFORT"S LIST OF HEIRS."

Is Your Name, or any of Your Relatives, in the Following List?

Below we give a few names taken from "COMFORT'S LIST OF HEIRS." If your name, or that of your family, is not here it is probably in the book, which also contains fuller particulars about all the names here represented. It is possible that relatives of yours may have died, either in this country, in Europe, in Australia or other parts of the world and left money, houses or land to which you may be the legitimate heir. The solicitors of the estate may have advertised for you in a London or New York paper, and of course you never saw it. If there was such an estate and if it was advertised it will probably be in "COMFORT'S LIST OF HEIRS." Campbell. Cannon. Carter.

A Diplomatic Incident.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY ALEXANDER MACPHERSON

Copyright, 1902, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

AUTOMOBILE of the latest pattern, brilliant with varnish and pol-ished metal, rolled swiftly over one of the asphalt avenues in Washington, bound out from the city into Washington, bo un dout from the city into the country.

The chaffeur who drove the machine was in immaculate livery. The one occupant of the car was a man whose dress and bearing would have led even a stranger in the city to have guessed that he belonged to the circle of foreign diplomats stationed at the capital. A few persons on the sidewalk, who knew the city well, seeing the machine glide past said, as they turned to look at it: "There goes the Auranian minister."

Not far out in the suburbs of Washington is a certain well-known road-house, not only patronized by bicyclers in its public rooms, but so noted for its cooking and drinks, and for the excellence of its little dinners, that it is a favorite place of resort for residents of the capital who affect more pretentious vehicles than a "safety."

The Auranian minister's chaffeur halted his car before the door of this house.

"Return for me in one hour," said the minister.

The man twisted the handles of his machine

The man twisted the handles of his machine

The man twisted the handles of his machine this way and that, until he had guided it around the hotel and had backed it into a broad shed built behind the building. Then, having looked after the motor, and seen to it that the machinery was in shape, he betook himself to a back room of the road-house where, by former experience, he knew that the beverages of his native country were to be procured.

The minister, giving no glance toward the occupants of the public room, walked directly through the hall of the building, up the stairs, and into a private room, which, as he did not stop to announce his entrance by knocking, evidently had been reserved for him. To a servant waiting in the room, after the man had taken his hat and coat, he gave an order for a bottle of wine and cigars.

Then, giving the man a piece of money as he left the room, he said: "I do not wish to be disturbed unless I ring;" adding, "Do you understand?"

"Yes, sir," said the man. "I will see to it." As the waiter's footsteps on the carpet of the

'Yes, sir," said the man. "I will see to it."

"Yes, sir," said the man. "I will see to it."
As the waiter's footsteps on the carpet of the corridor grew faint in the distance, the minister opened the door which the man had closed behind him, and carefully placing it two or three inches ajar, returned to a seat in which he could not be seen by any one who might pass through the hall.

A few minutes later a young man who had been sitting alone at one of the tables in the public room below, with a paper and a glass of beer before him, threw down the paper, drained his glass, and then rising carelessly, sauntered across the room as if to go. Once in the hall, though, when he was sure that he was alone, instead of turning to the street door he went quickly and silently up the stairs and along the hall to the door ajar. Pushing the door open he went into the room.

"Ah!" said the diplomat. "So you have come." Then he closed the door of the room and locked it.

and locked it.

In the early evening of the aday a young woman was bending over a dinner table set for two in the tiny dining room of a cheap city flat in Washington. All that taste and good will could do to make the table and room attractive had been done, and giving a last touch to a handful of daffodils in a glass in the middle of the table, the woman stepped back to inspect her work.

Then, going to the door of the kitchen, she said to a colored woman at work there: "Jane, you may put the soup on now. Mr. Eswald will be home directly."

A few minutes later, just as the young wo-

Mili be home directly."

A few minutes later, just as the young woman was pinning one of the yellow flowers against the dull blue cloth of her gown, a key rattled in the lock of the flat hall door, and the young man who had been locked in the room at the road-house with the Auranian minister came in.

at the road-house with the Auranian minister came in.

He kissed his wife, and then holding her off from him at arms' length, looked long and lovingly at her.

"Bee," he said, "you grow prettier and prettier. You're a hundred times more beautiful today than you were a year ago."

"Oh, you did remember, didn't you?" the woman said. "I didn't believe you would. And," leading the way to the dining room, "I was going to surprise you."

"Well you didn't, you see;" he said. "Perhaps when we have been married ten years I may forget when the day comes round, but not when it's been only one year.

"I've got a surprise for you, too," he said, his eyes shining, but shining—if any one had looked closely enough at him to see—with what were almost tears. "I wasn't going to spring it on you till after dinner, but now you've begun the surprise business, I guess I will."

"What is it?"

"Guess."

"Oh, I can't,"

"Guess."
"Oh, I can't,"

She guessed a dozen things, including a new dress and a French bull dog, but he shook his head at each.

"Well, what is it, then?"
"A new house, all your own, and paid for."
"What!"

"A house of our own, by ourselves; on the

"A house of our own, by ourselves; on the ground, with no elevator and no neighbors below us who cook cabbage."

"Robert Eswald! You don't mean it!"

"Yes I do. Or rather I mean that I've got the money to buy it and pay for it. Of course I wouldn't dare to pick out a house without your help."

He took a roll of bills from his pocket, and smoothing them out on the white table cloth—bills of large denominations, too—counted out $4.000.

$4,000.

"Robert! Most wonderful of men! Where and how did you get this?"

The man hesitated a minute. "It was speculation," he said. "I had some stock, and I sold it at a high price."

In their excitement they had not heard the Swanson's "5-DROPS" is truly the foundation of perfect health. It acts on the blood, purifying it and driving out all poisonous matter. It strengthens the nerves and gives refreshing sleep to the mentally tired and overworked. It builds up the entire system, fortifying tagainst the attack of disease. "5-DROPS" is not only a cure for but also a preventative of disease, and a dose taken occasionally will keep the blood pure and healthy, thus insuring perfect circulation. When the blood is pure disease is almost an impossibility. "5-DROPS" is absolutely harmless, it contains no oplates or injurious drugs and can be taken by a child as well as an adult. It is good for young and old, an unfailing help in the time of sickness. No one can afford to be without it. Get a bottle today and have it on hand ready for use in case of emergency.

Such testimony as we print below from grateful people who have been returned to perfect health by the use of "5-DROPS" is certainly sufficient to convince any one that "5-DROPS" is the most remarkable medical discovery in the world.

most remarkable medical discovery in the world.

MRS. EMMA KEMMERER. Lancaster, Ohio, writes:—"I must say that "5-DROPS" has worked wonders for mey For 25 years I suffered with Sciatic Rheumatism and Sleeplessness. Since using "5-DROPS" my pain is all gone, and I can sleep well all night: something I could not do for the last fifteen years. I must say that "5-DROPS" is the grandest medicine on earth, and I will never cease praising it."

H. F. HAWKINS, Greenville, S. C., writes:—"I take pleasure in stating what "5-DROPS" has done for my grandmother. She was down in bed with Rheumatism in her back and could not turn over by herself. I received a bottle of "5-DROPS" and she took it, according to directions, and she was out of bed by the time she took two-thirds of the bottle, and by the time she took all of the bottle she was able to do some work and has been well ever since."

S. P. ALLEMAN, Dallison, W. Va., writes:—"I feel it my duty to drop you a few lines. We had a little boy five years old, suffering with moving pains all through him. He commenced to get better from the first dose we gave him of your "5-DROPS" and by the time your bottle was used up, the pains were gone also. We recommend it ahead of any medicine we ever saw for which we send our thanks."

MRS. CHAS. T. ELM, Monaca. Pa., writes:—"For several months my limbs were so sore I could hardly move them. I had large red spots wherever I had a pain. The doctor told me I had Infiammatory Rheumatism in a bad stage, and the hives, but his medicine failed. I tried other doctors but none of them done me any good. I saw "5-DROPS" advertised and sent for a sample bottle. The sample gave me instant relief, and I procured a large size bottle at once. I used that one bottle and now I am entirely cured. I cannot say too much in praise of "5-DROPS" is the one."

Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Lumbago, Sciatica, Asthma, Catarrh, Liver and Kidney Troubles, Nervousness, Backache, Dyspepsia, Gout, Indigestion, Croup, Nervous and Neuralgio Headache, Heart Weakness, Paralysis, Creeping Numbness, Sleeplessness and Blood Diseases. A Sure Gure for Goughs, Golds, La Grippe and Bronchial Troubles.

When you are suffering with Rheumatism in any form take "5-DROPS." It does not matter whether you have inflammatory, muscular or articular rheumatism, this remedy if taken as directed will give instant reliet and effect an early and permanent cure. It rids the blood, tissues and joints of the uric acid and other poisonous matter which causes those intense rheumatic pains. This is the only way in which a cure can be effected.

You who suffer with those terrible shooting pains caused by Neuralgia, should use "5-DROPS." It removes all the pains with almost lightning rapidity and Neuralgia becomes only a memory of the past. For all bodily aches and pains "5-DROPS" is the best thing you can use. It acts like magic in all cases of sprains, aches or bruises, removing the inflammation and soreness in a wonderfully short time.

For all Liver Troubles and Kidney Diseases use "5-DROPS." A small dose of this remedy is more effectual and has more curative power than a barrel of other medicines where these diseases are concerned. It is the most successful medicine ever discovered for the Kidneys, Liver and Blood.

For Coughs and Colds, use "5-DROPS." By taking it at bedtime and in the morning before breakfast it will relieve and cure the most severe cough. It will break up a cold quicker than any other medicine, thereby preventing Bronchitis, Pneumonia, etc., which are the result of a cold not properly treated with the right remedy.

Catarrh and Asthma, those most distressing diseases, can be cured if you use "5-DROPS." Unlike almost any other remedy it is used internally and also inhaled, thus giving a thorough systemic treatment which affords early relief and effectually cures.

"Here's a letter for you, Mrs. Eswald," she said. "A boy brought it. He didn't wait."
"For me?" said the woman. Then, as the maid, eyeing the money curiously, left the room, "Who can it be from? Do you suppose somebody else has sent me a surprise?"
She cut the end of the envelope with a silver fruit knife, one of their year-old presents, and pulled the letter out.

She reached the letter out to him.

"Mrs. Eswald:—" it began. The writing was coarse and bold. "You will pardon a stranger writing to you, but this is a matter of business. Your husband has today sold to the Auranian minister a copy of a paper which his work in the State Department made it possible for him to handle. He stole it. He got $2,000 for it. I want half the money. If I get it no harm will come to him. If I don't get it there will."

Then followed directions hand.

Then followed directions how the money was to be paid over before daylight the next morn-"Is what that letter says true?

"Is what that letter says true?"

"Yes," said the man dully, laying the paper down on the table beside the money.

"I did it for you;" he broke out a little later, as if he could not bear the silence any longer.

"I've known for a month," he went on, without looking up at her, "that I could do this any time I would. Yesterday, when I saw Senator Ellory talking with you, and knew that he had wanted to marry you only a little while ago, and that you chose me—a clerk—instead of him, with all he could give you, I couldn't stand it.

"I thought," he went on bitterly, "that if you wasn't sorry then, you would be pretty soon, if I couldn't do more to make you happy. So I did it. I don't know who got on to it. Somebody has. He's guessed all right except the amount. I'm ruined, fast enough; and I've dragged you into it too."

The color had come back to the woman's face while her husband was speaking. Almost be-

The man hesitated a minute. "It was specuation," he said. "I had some stock, and I sold at a high price."

In their excitement they had not heard the

"Get your hat and coat, Robert," she said, turning back to the room, "and come with me. "Take the money, and that letter," she added. She was already putting on her own hat and wren. It was later still when Robert Eswald and wren.

Half an hour later the maid opened the kitchen door softly and peeped into the room. Seeing no one she came in, and went through all the rooms.

all the rooms.

"For the land sake!" she exclaimed. "What funny folks! Here they've run off without eatin'; an' left the dinner a spilin'. I 'spose they've gone to spend all that money;" she reflected aloud.

Shut in a committee room at the Capitol with her husband and Senator Ellory, the year-old wife told their story simply, but clearly. When she had finished she hesitated a moment. Then, raising her head bravely, she went on, "You told me once that in spite of—things—if ever you could do anything to help me, to let you know. I want you to help me now, to save the reputation and happiness of the man I love better than all the rest of the world." better than all the rest of the world.

better than all the rest of the world."

Senator Ellory may have been twice the age of the woman who stood before him, or more, but no one seeing him look at her then, would have doubted the honesty of the love which he had had for her—which he had for her yet. He looked at his watch.

"I will do what I can," he said. He pressed a button. "Get the White House for me on the telephone," he said to the messenger who answered the summons. Then, to the man and woman before him, "Come back here at eleven o'clock."

An hour later the Associated Press in Wash-An hour later the Associated Press in Washington added to its report of the day's news sent out over the country, the item that the Senate had gone into executive session. Later in the night there was a wild scurrying hither and thither of excited newspaper correspondents stationed in Washington, followed by a distracted clicking of telegraph instruments. In the next morning's papers millions of readers all over the country read under flashing headlines the news that a foreign treaty of momentous importance had been acted upon by the Senate the night before. It was later still when Robert Eswald and his wife let themselves into their flat. The maid had gone home long before that.

When the click of the electric switch flooded the place with light, and the woman saw the table on which all her touches of home-love still showed, she, who so far had gone bravely and dry-eyed through it all, broke down.

"Don't! Beatrice!" begged her husband, throwing himself on his knees beside the couch on which she had flung herself. "Don't! Oh, don't!" Drawing her to him, he held her folded in his arms until her sobbing ceased.

A Talk With Our Readers.

We intend to get in closer touch with our five million readers, and we shall have something to say to them in this column every month.

The editor of a daily newspaper or a ten or twenty-five cent monthly has a "soft snap" compared with the problem which faces the editor of Comfort. Fancy having to cater to the different tastes and wishes of one-fit-teenth of the whole population of the United

We get far more letters than the average editor, but we want more. We're not editing this paper to suit our own tastes, but to please you. Don't forget that. We are constantly trying new features, besides endeavoring to improve the old ones. But when we start a new department we can't tell whether you like it or not unless you write to us. If there is anything about the paper you don't care for, drop us a line and we'll leave it out. If you like our new continued stories why not say so? If you think we ought to have more pictures why not ask for them? If you don't see what you want ask for it.

COMFORT is growing all the time. We shall soon celebrate our fifteenth birthday. We are doing all we know how to improve the paper and to give you each month a better paper than the last. Our circulation is growing too. We are now aiming for the two million mark. There is no reason why we should not get there, but we can't do it without the help of each one of our present subscribers.

Did it ever occur to you that COMFORT gave you right in your own home all the facilities of a visit to a large city? Look over our advertising columns and you will see how true this is. You will find advertised there almost this is. You will find advertised there almost anything that you could possibly need from youth to old age. If you are out of employment there are people who can give you work to do. If you are young and need education to fit you for work here are schools of instruction where you may learn. If you have recently married and are about to start up housekeeping you will find advertised stoves, tea and dinner sets, organs for the parlor, sewing machines and buggies. If you are sick here are remedies which will make you well. Do you want to sell your farm? Here is a man who says he will buy it. No matter what your condition is in life or what your present needs may be they can be supplied

Told by the Drummer.

A Country Dog.

A Country Dog.

HE New York drummer was sitting in front of the hotel in the country town, after his day's work of seeing customers was done, and he was talking to a party of men who were also taking it easy at the close of the day. On the side he was playing with a very lively and impetuous fox terrier belonging to the landlord.

"I like dogs," he said, "just because I like them. They are something on the order of a meal of victualis—very nice when you want it and no use on earth when you don't. All of which reminds me of a dog I met not long ago I had a day off in New York, where I live, and I went over for a ramble among the hills and valleys about Fort Lee, which is on the Jersey shore opposite to the upper part of the city. My wife went along to see that I got home safely, and as we wandered about aimlessly we were joined by a pretty little white dog about three months old, I should say. It was a most friendly dog, and after it had kept with us for quite a while we began to feel an interest in it and keep an eye out that it didn't get lost. It was quite at home along the country roads and in the woods, and only barked ance when a hunter and another dog showed up in the bushes. When we finished our tramp and came back to the top of the hill over-looking the river, we thought it was time for doggie to go home, but doggie wasn't so inclined and followed us to the ferry, by which time my wife had concluded that it would be cruel to turn the poor little thing adrift, and announced that she would take it home with her. It was all right in the ferry house and made friends right and lett, for it was a bright one, and when the gates were opened and the crowd started for the boat, my wife picked it up and hustled with the rest. Then it was that the dog seemed to understand it was no longer in the country, and at sight of the rushing people, the wagons and the ferryboat, it set upa harking that embarrassed my wife so I thought one, and when the gates were opened and the crowd started for the boat, my wife picked it up and hustled with the rest. Then it was that the dog seemed to understand it was no longer in the country, and at sight of the rushing people, the wagons and the ferryboat, it set ups barking that embarrassed my wife so I thought she would throw it overboard. The dog wasn't angry at all, only excited, and it was content to keep its place in my wife's arms and do its barking from there.

"It became quiet after a few minutes and I took it, when the boat had pulled out into the stream, and went forward with it. Its amazement at the broad stretch of water was most interesting to watch. It forgot all about people, horses and ferryboat arad was intent only upon the water before it. It sniffed the fresh air like a sailor, perked up its cars and trembled all over with excitement, looking up into my face at intervals as if it would be glad for me to tell it what it was all about. It watched our landing curiously, but did not bark at anything. On shore again, I put it down, and it ran along with us to the street car, when my wife took it up and carried it aboard. It reached its nose out to see if I was next to her, and then it proceeded to bark again at every person who came into the car, thimking no doubt that it was in its own house, our house, and thee strangers had no business there. When the car started, it looked sround to me for explantion, and I patted it on the head to reassure it. The first time the conductor rang the bell to stop the car, the dog cocked its ears towerd the bell and barked at it. In the mean time it had stopped barking at people who came into the car, the dog cocked its ears towerd the bell and barked at it. In the mean time it had stopped barking at people who came into the car, the dog cocked its ears towerd the bell and barked at it. In the mean time it had stopped barking at people who came into the car, the dog on the street, and inturter remarks from it. When we left the cr. All this time it lay in something terrific. It stood up on its hind legs pulling, and shouted and whooped it up for the flying turn-out in a way that would have moved the soul of an old-time volunteer rush. It tugged at the chain and begged me to let it go into the thick of the noise and hurry, but I hung on and only let it enjoy itself under restrictions until the engine went out of sight. Then a whizzing electric car engaged its mind and it wanted to catch the car, but the chain held and the dog pulled so to get away that the collar choked its bark off. Lord knows how I got it home, but I did, and when it was under roof once more, it off. Lord knows how I got it home, but I die, and when it was under roof once more, it quieted down and in a short time it was so sleepy, from reaction, I suppose, that it curled up on a sofa and soon was dreaming, no doubt, of the new world it had come into and what a great old time it would have for the rest of its natural life.

"When I left home it was doing as well as good he expected but it cannot go out unless it.

to all since the Spanish war and our Philippine operations are Generals John R. Brooke and Arthur MacArthur. Gen. Brooke has recently retired for age, and he has been succeeded by Gen. MacArthur, who will also retire before a great while. Sixty-two is the age limit, but officers may held over two years.

21, 22. Very much in the public eye of all the world during a portion of the summer was Governor Tatt, representing the American government in its negotiations with the Pope concerning the removal of the friars from their places in the Philippines; and Cardinal Rampolla, the head of the Commission of Cardinals. Although the negotiations were not wholly successful owing to the opposition of the cardinals and others, the Pope favored the opposition made by Governor Tatt. The matter remains unsettled but this government is firm in its determination to remove the friars.

23, 24. The most sensational and wide spread scandal of recent years was that attending the elopement of Captain P. B. Strong, son of the former Mayor Strong, of New York City, and May Yohe, an actress, and wife of Lord Francis Hope of England. Strong resigned his position in the regular army on his way to the Philippines, and with the woman they left San Francisco for Japan. Here they lived lavishly, and in April last they came back to New York, and recently Strong disappeared with $150,000 worth of Miss Yohe's jewelry. His mother and family paid the loss on condition that Miss Yohe would not prosecute. In the meantime, Lord Hope secured a divorce.

25. All the world felt a personal loss when the news came that the famous campanile, or bell tower in the plaza of St. Mark's, Venice, had fallen in a heap after standing a thousand years. Everybody who saw Venice saw the famous tower, and nearly all the rest of the world had seen it in pictures. Offers to assist in rebuilding poured in, and among them came an offer of the great sum of $100,000 from Giovanni Morosini, the New York banker, whose daughter some years ago acquired a national reputation by eloping with her father's coachman. Mr. Morosini made the offer as a remem-

1, 2. With not so much as a ripple on the surface, the Premiership of Great Britain recently passed from the hands of Lord Salisbury, who has held it since July 2, 1895, to those of his nephew, Arthur J. Balfour, leader of the House of Commons. With the exception of Lord Liverpool, Lord Salisbury had held the office longer than any other Premier for a hundred years. Mr. Balfour is fifty-four years of age, and his uncle is seventy-two.

3. This country, as well as others, was disposed to criticise very severely Gen. Jacob H. Smith of the U. S. Army in the Philippines, for his order to "kill, burn, and destroy" all natives fighting against the United States. His friends made many excuses for the order, which was not official, but he was brought before an examining commission, which recommended a reprimand. The President, however, for political or other reasons, viewed the matter more seriously and retired Gen. Smith.

4. The men who think the air may be navigated are never at rest, though none have ever mede any advance of a practical kind in solving the problem. The latest inventor to come forward with an air ship that is "warranted" to sail anywhere and settle the question, is John Schnepf, a New York mechanic, who has constructed an "aerial mobile" which he claims is a new idea and will be a success. In the meantime we should not wait for it if we want to go anywhere this year.

5. Another story has been set afloat that the anarchists of Paterson, N. J., headquarters for the red caps, have sent one of their number over to assassinate King Victor Emanuel of Italy, whose father was killed by Bresci, another of the Paterson gang.

6. One of the great Trust Magnates of this country is Clement A. Griscom of Philadelphia, President of the American Steamship Line, and associated with J. Pierpont Morgan in consolidating the merchant marine of the Atlantic Ocean. It is probable that these rich men will control all the trans-Atlantic business before many months.

7. One of the really great orators of this country, in which oratory is scarcer now than in the days of Webster and Clay, is W. Burke Cochran, of New York, former Congressman. Mr. Cochran has been delivering orations on several occasions lately, after some years of silence, and whenever he speaks thousands turn out to hear him. Mr. Cochran is a Democrat, and he is yet young and active enough to be a power in politics.

8. M. Herve Faye, one of the greatest of astronomers, known as the "Father of Astronomers," and Dean of the French Academy of Sciences, as well as its oldest member, died recently at Paris, at the age of eighty-eight. He was the head of the French Nautical Office and president of the official board of the Paris Observatory.

9. John M. Burke, a merchant of New York City, celebrated his ninetieth birthday recently by giving four millions of dollars to establish a home for persons who had become impoverished by adversity. Mr. Burke had given a great deal to charity in addition, but he had done it all so quietly that it was not known. Even this great gift would have been kept quiet, but the trustees of the fund, named by Mr. Burke, thought best to make it public.

10. Hayti is one of those southern republics known as the "Black Republic," because it is controlled by negroes, who are always ready for a revolution. At last accounts the factions were drawn up in the streets of Port au Prince, prepared for battle. The partisans of Gen. Firmin are attempting to get the government from the provisional president and his party.

11. A famous character in New York City died there recently. He was Christopher Robert Forbes, who for many years had the honor of annually raising the Stars and Stripes at Battery Park on Evacuation Day, Fourth of July and Washington's Birthday. Mr. Forbes was a letter carrier at first, but later became a guard on the Elevated Railway. Mr. Forbes was deprived of the honor of flag raiser in 1896, by the Society of the War of 1812, and the act changed his whole life and he brooded over it until his death.

12, 13. Two very important persons in the politics of this country are Senator James K. Jones of Arkansas, Chairman National Democratic Committee, and Senator Hanna, Chairman of the Republican Committee. Each has made a public statement of political conditions, Chairman Jones saving his party has opportu-

Chairman Jones saying his party has opportunities to make gains in the West, and Chairman Hauna saying that there will be a safe and sure election of a Republican House of Representatives. The fall elections will tell which is the better guesser.

a man of family, does not use liquor or tobacco, and is fifty-four years of age.

28. America is not the only country where poor boys can rise to the highest places, although it may be easier to do so here than elsewhere. Richard J. Seddon, the new Premier of New Zealand, a British colony in the South Pacific, was a poor farmer in England, who went to Australia, working in the mines, thence to New Zealand where he rose to be Premier. He is a strong man of great natural ability, but uneducated and rough in his manners.

29. The successor in the United States Senate to Senator James K. Jones of Arkansas, Chairman of the National Democratic Committee, is James P. Clarke, who is a "fighter from Wayback." Mr. Clarke, though but forty-eight, has been Governor of the state and has held other offices. He is a Democrat and made his fight against the political rings of his state.

30. The new Governor General of Australia is Lord Tennyson, son of the Poet Laureate Tennyson, the greatest of modern English poets. Lord Tennyson succeeded Lord Hopetoun, who resigned because the salary $50,000 a year was not sufficient to maintain the dignity of such a court as he is compelled to have. Lord Tennyson is no richer than was Lord Hopetoun and he will probably resign after trying it awhile.

31. The military forces of our nearest neighbor on the north, Canada, are not very large, as indeed our own are not, but they have a Commander in Chief, and the latest appointment to the position is Major General the Earl of Dundonald, who comes over from England. General Dundonald is fifty years of age, a soldier of great distinction, and his appointment is a high compliment to the people of Canada, who have long urged their right to have distinguished men appointed to posts in the colony.

32. Japan has a J. Pierpont Morgan, who is almost as rich and as powerful as our American millionaire, who has been buying up nearly all the loose portions of the earth. The Japan millionaire is Baron Shibusawa, who is now paying a visit to the United States to study financial conditions here. His picture shows a strong face, with few of the Japanese characteristics.

33. Bozo Gacina is a Dalmatian boy who ought some day to be a famous American citizen. He was so anxious to come to this country that he stole his way for 12,000 miles, the last three thousand being in an empty boller of a "donkey" engine on the steamship Umbria. As a stowaway the little chap staid in his hiding place for a week, fed by friendly stokers who had found him. He was caught before leaving the ship at New York, however, and would have been sent back, as he had been once before, but some good American heard of his case and went on his bond, he believing that such a boy would make a good citizen.

34,35. King Albert, the old King of Saxony, having died at the age of 78, he is succeeded by his brother Prince George, who is seventy. King Albert had no children. King George's son, Frederick Augustus, will succeed him at his death. King Albert was a fine old gentleman, and a Catholic, while the great majority of his subjects are Protestants, but he was very popular and the greatest harmony between King and people always existed.

36. A very pretty actress known to theatregoers in this country was Miss Irene Perry, but she is no longer Miss Perry, for, much to the surprise of all her acquaintances outside and inside theatre circles, she recently became the wife of Harvey Wilson Bell, son of Bishop Bell of North Carolina. Although Miss Perry was popular as an actress and made a hit in a new play, she will retire from the stage. The wedding took place in Boston.

37. The wife of Hon. William B. Ridgeley, Comptroller of the Currency, died at the Johns-Hopkins Hospital, Baltimore, after undergoing an operation for appendicitis. ## BY CHRISTINE TERHUNE HERRICK, NOTE BY THE EDITOR—In conducting this department Mrs. Herrick would be pleased to answer any questions that our readers may ask. It is her desire to please all "COMFORT" readers and in order to find out your likes and dislikes can't you write and ask a few questions. By so doing you may give us some hint or suggestion as to how this Household Department should be conducted to suit the greatest number of our readers. Mrs. Herrick's mother, MAR10N HARLAND, has made herself famous by her rare judgment in household matters, and her daughter is equally gifted in this connection. ## Common Sense Preserving.

HEN I use the word preserving, I do not mean to confine myself to the "pound for pound" putting up of our grandmothers. That was the meaning connected with the word once upon a time. I mean it here to include any methtime. I mean it here to include any methods of putting up fruits to keep them, whether this be converting them into jams or jellies or pickles or sweet conserves. Each process has its own peculiarities but there are a few general principles that apply to all.

Probably no woman with a true housekeeping spirit and a garden or orchard besides who does not feel a desire to turn the kindly fruits of the earth into some compound that will does not feel a desire to turn the kindly fruits of the earth into some compound that will enable her to keep them through the winter. Many women take it as a matter of course that they should can certain fruits and vegetables for cold weather consumption. Canned goods of all sorts and degrees of excellence are so cheap that it hardly pays to put them up if one has to purchase materials. But when there is a garden at command, it is well worth while to can vegetables of several varieties, and berries, and other fruit for pies and tarts and stewed fruit later on.

ries, and other fruit for pies and tarts and stewed fruit later on.

Even if one questions the wisdom of canning under some circumstances, there can be no debate as to the sense and economy of doing one's own pickling and preserving or of putting up one's own jellies and jams. The thrifty housewife has not waited until now to show her faith by her works but has already a good ner faith by her works but has already a good supply of currant and crab apple jelly as well as of berry jams. Now perhaps she may be hesitating a little as to what she will do about later provisions. Her cucumbers are already in the pickle and it may be she has pickle of melon rind well under way. What else shall she do?

There are several other possibilities ahead of her. One is a conserve of peaches that is less expensive than the old-fashioned preserves, and yet more palatable than the plain canned peaches, which are seldom very good to the taste unless they are doctored a bit after they are taken from the can. She may make a conserve of pears in the same way, and although serve of pears in the same way, and although these may lack the distinctive flavor of the peaches, they may yet, by wise flavoring, be made almost as good.

made almost as good.

Then the housekeeper may use the grapes that are plenty late in the fall, just before frost, in two or three rather unusual ways. Every one likes grape jelly, which is second only to currant in its value for seasoning and as an accompaniment to meats. But every one is not so familiar with spiced grapes and with grape marmalade, although these are well worth knowing.

is not so familiar with spiced grapes and with grape marmalade, although these are well worth knowing.

A use that is none too common may be made of the superabundance of apples that prevails on almost every farm, by canning them. This canning is not done in quite the usual fashion and the product is a delicious sweet that answers for a dessert at dinner or supper.

Before beginning upon her business of putting up, the housekeeper must, of course, be sure that she has all that she needs in the sure that she has all that she needs in the house. I ought perhaps to apologize for insulting the intelligence of my readers by intimating the possibility of their neglecting such a measure. But the wisest housekeepers are caught napping sometimes, and I have known even those with a good store of experience to forget until too late to make sure that all the glass jars they counted upon using were furnished with tops and fresh rubber rings, that the sugar barrel was not too low, that the store of spices had been replenished or that the sharp knives to be used in peeling fruit needed a turn on the grindstone or a rub on the whetstone.

None of these precautions should be overlooked. When everything else is in order the housekeeper must resolve that her temper will keep in the same strain. Putting up fruit is never easy or cool work and the person undertaking it should spare herself as much as possible. The fruit should be prepared in the coolest corner attainable and the worker should sit whenever she can. There will be plenty of standing that she will not be able to avoid. Moreover, she should try to choose a day for her putting up when the other work of the house will be comparatively light. This is one of the occasions when there should be cold meat for dinner and when all the cookery of any sort except that of the fruit should be put aside as far as can be. any sort except that of the fruit should be put lie in the sugar a n u m ber of hours before cooking it may be advisable to be peeled the night before. The peaches must be pared and halved and the stones removed. Then the fruit is put in layers in bowls or dishes and each layer is covered with sugar, to draw out the juice. In this state they should be left from six to eight hours. The shorter period is enough, but the longer time will do no harm. no harm.

no harm.

When the housekeeper is ready to begin the work of cooking she should turn the juice and sugar from the fruit and put both over the fire in a preserving kettle. Here they must come to the boil and simmer for ten minutes afterwards and then she may drop in the fruit. This checks the boil and after this is resumed the peaches may boil ten minutes. Then they are to be taken out with a strainer and put into glass jars set in a pan of scalding water at one side of the stove. They must be kept at this heat while the syrup in the pot is boiled down thick, a process that will require about fifteen minutes. It is then ready to be poured in upon the fruit and the jars are at once sealed.

When pear conserves are made, lemon juice and green ginger must be added to the syrup until the flavor is very perceptible. It will then affect the taste of the fruit on which it is poured.

poured.

Grape jelly is made like any other jelly, the fruit being put into a kettle or stone crock over the fire and cooked until soft, the juice squeezed out and measured and a pound of granulated sugar allowed for each pint of the juice. The juice is then put back on the stove, brought to a quick boil and cooked for twenty minutes, skimmed and the sugar added. After the boil is resumed the jelly need cook but one minute before it is taken off and put into the glasses.

minutes, skimmed and the sugar added. After the boil is resumed the jelly need cook but one minute before it is taken off and put into the glasses.

For the spiced grapes there is very little more work although there are more ingredients. The grapes must be weighed and it is well to stem them. Three quarters of a pound of sugar must be allowed for every pound of grapes. To every five pounds of the fruit must be allotted a pint of vinegar and two tablespoonfuls each of ground cloves and cinnamon. The grapes should be pulped before cooking. Some persons seed them as well, but this is not necessary if the fruit is rubbed through the colander afterwards. Put all the ingredients over the fire together, bring to a boil, cook half an hour, rub through the colander or through a vegetable press and put into jelly glasses with tightly fitting tops.

To make grape marmalade, the grapes must be picked over and stemmed. They must be put over the fire and cooked for half an hour after they reach the boil and the fruit then put through the vegetable press. There will be a good deal more juice than is needed and this may be made into jelly. The pulp should be weighed and if the grapes are not very sweet, sugar may be added in proportion of three quarters of a pound of this to every pound of the fruit. Fruit and sugar should boil together for half an hour before taking the marmalade from the fire and putting it into pint jars with air tight tops.

Juicy, well-flavored apples, a little tart, should be used for the canned apples. They must be peeled, cored and quartered and each piece must be dropped into cold water at once. When all is prepared, they should be drained, weighed and put over the fire in a preserving kettle. Half a pound of sugar should be allowed for each pound of the fruit and this should be added after the fruit has been boiled slowly for half an hour. It is wise to dip out a part of the juice before putting in the sugar. This juice, like that from the grapes, may be made into jelly. The fruit should boil ten mi

J. H. Gravenhurst.—Utensils made of aluminum are lighter and cleaner than those of any other metal. Their contents heat more quickly than those of other vessels and on this account there is sometimes risk of burning. Aluminum is generally highly esteemed by domestic specialists.

To make bouillon, cover three pounds of chopped, lean beaf with three pints of cold water. Put in with it an onion, a stalk of celery and a bay leaf, reduce to one quart of liquid by boiling. Add two teaspoonfuls of salt and set aside to cool. When cold, strain and clear with crushed shell and white of egg. Bring the bouillon to a boil with this in it, skim and strain. Fill these nearly to the brim. Have ready a large kettle in which you have laid a rack across the bottom. Place a folded cloth on this and on this cloth set the filled jars, uncovered. Pour warm water about them and bring it to a boil. Cook two hours. Fill one jar from another as the corn shrinks. Put the covers on the jars and tighten them again after the corn is cold. Your trouble with both the corn and the tomatoes is due either to your not having cooked them long enough or to the jars having been imperfectly sealed. Defective rubbers may be at fault. The Cascade Grade Problem.

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY F. E. BURNHAM.

HE engineer of the HE engineer of the Eastern freight exceeded the fifteenmile-an-hour limit which the Company had set for the down freight over the twelve mile grade between Cascade and Leadville, and the result was a call over the carpet before the superintendent.

ent.
"Do not let it occur again," said the official, decidedly, "the speed indicator must speed indicator must not show a higher rate than fifteen miles an hour on the down trip; this regulation must be lived up to, or you will have to step out." The Cascade Grade was the longest and heaviest on the road, and fearing lest an accident occur and the cident occur and the cident occur and the train hands lose control of the freight, the engineer had been restricted to the above running time, though lighter trains were exempt from the regulation. John Webber, the engineer of the freight, was in a quandary; to hold the train down to the four minute rate was next thing to an impossibility, and to fail to do so meant discharge. The night following his reprimand from the superintendent, however, an inspiration came to Webber, he immediately carried it out.

Within the caboose at the rear end of the train was a contrivance called a speed indicator; this was connected with the rear wheels of the caboose in such a way as to punch a hole in a long tape with each revolution, and the faster the wheels turned, the closer were these holes cator; this was connected with the rear wheels of the caboose in such a way as to punch a hole in a long tape with each revolution, and the faster the wheels turned, the closer were these holes punched in the tape, and so perfectly was the machine adjusted that the speed of the car could be told almost to a second.

Engineer Webber's plan was to cut the caboose loose from the rest of the train when the long freight reached the summit of the grade, and flying down the incline at a forty or fifty mile an hour rate, stop at the foot of the grade for the caboose to catch up, a brakeman managing the brake, easily holding the car down to the regulation speed of one mile in four minutes. This might go on for years and no word reach the superintendent's ears, and as there was everything to gain and nothing to lose, for he was sure to lose his place if he attempted to hold the entire train, an impossibility except under the most favorable circumstances, the engineer did not hesitate to carry out this daring solution of the problem, which half a dozen engineers had failed to see, and failing to hold the train, had lost their positions.

Weeks passed and all ran smoothly no accident occurred and the train crew congratulated each other over the easy disposal of that which had been the most arduous of the day's work. As for the superintendent, he smiled as he examined the tape from time to time, pleased that his decisive words with the engineer had sufficed to bring about the desired effect.

In the employ of the road, however, was an engineer, Henderson by name, who ran the night mail, one of the best equipped trains on the road. Between Webber and this man there was some misunderstanding, and Henderson, learning of the manner in which the Cascade Grade was being disposed of, thought to throw down Webber by reporting it to the superintendent. This, no doubt, would have worked very satisfactorily, had the superintendent been less keenly alive to the humorous side of the situation; as it was, the whole affair turned out in a guess," said the superintendent, looking sharply at the engineer,

"No, I'm afraid it isn't," replied the engineer, a ghost of a smile playing about his lips, "she does it occasionally."
"A habit, eh?" queried the superintendent.
Suddenly the official caught hold of Webber's arm and pointed up the track to a dark object more than a mile away.
"There's your caboose," he said, "coming at regulation speed—fifteen miles an hour."
That night Webber of the freight and Henderson of the mail were summoned to the superin-

The superintendent looked up from his writing as the men entered, both coming precisely the time set by the official, and requested cisely the time set by the official, and requested them to be seated.

"The Company appreciates employees of ready wit," said the superintendent, coming to the point at once, and is always ready to recognize such, be the man wiper or engineer. I have seen fit to make a change in two instances. Mr. Webber, consider yourself engineer of the night mail, going on duty tonight." night.

Henderson was on his feet in an instant, turning fairly black in the face. He attempted to protest, but his words choked him.

"We desire careful men, those willing to work hard to obey the Company's regulations," continued the superintendent, turning to Henderson, "consider yourself engineer of the Eastern freight; your duties will commence with the morrow. Do not forget this point, however, "the caboose must not be detached from the rest of the train."

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

[Caleb Brett, an aged and prominent citizen of Mansfield village, drew a considerable sum of money from the bank on a certain forenoon, and was seen to enter Purinton's mill on the edge of the village. He did not reappear, and later a searching party found his old beaver hat on a slab pile at the foot of a sluice leading from the upper part of the mill, where he had entered. It was considered probable that the old man had come to his death by falling down the sluice. The strange part of the affair was that the body had been removed by persons unknown—admitting the presumption that he was really dead. Several persons were in the mill at or near the time he was seen to enter: his nephew, George Brett, with whom he had been having trouble about the young man's proposed marriage to a girl below him in social standing; Arthur Wing, the village printer and suitor of the squire; Baniel Purinton, owner of the mill, and one who was intending to borrow a large sum from the old man that day. After some weeks both George Brett and Arthur Wing were arrested on suspicion of having been concerned in the old man's taking off. Brett was released on small bonds after certain testimony seemed to throw the burden of the matter upon Wing. At the hearing granted to Wing before a local trial justice, a small boy brought in a message signed by Caleb Brett, apparently, but written by another hand. In the note—admitting that he wrote it—he declared that he was still alive.] SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER V.

EAVING the audience in the court room to buzz their excitement over the missive so sensationally interjected into this strange case, the justice, the county attorney and the detectives retired to an ante-room to examine the scrap of writ-ante-room to examine the scrap of writing.

"It's the squire's signature, ain't it?" the justice asked of the treasurer of the savings bank.

"It certainly is," replied that gentleman, who was better qualified than any other in the village to pronounce on such a matter.

"Do you gentlemen have the least idea the squire really is alive?" inquired the justice, pushing up his glasses after a second prolonged scrutiny of the note.

Detective Ordwell held the scrap of paper at the time. He said after a short pause:

"Probably all of you have noted the same things about this paper that I have. Its top is uneven, showing that it has been scissored from the bottom of a larger sheet. The writing is crowded together above the signature showing that the writing has been adjusted to the signature must have been on the paper when the person who penned the note commenced to write. What sort of a paper was that signature affixed to, should you say, Mr. Treasurer?"

"It looks to me as though that was the bottom of a blank lease. I have known that the squire carried several about in his pocket-book. He usually signed them in the bank so that he could use his quill pen on them and left the

He usually signed them in the bank so that he could use his quill pen on them and left the rest to be filled in later."

"Therefore the chances are that the person who got the pocket-book from the body of the squire found this paper and has employed this subterfuge of the note," said Ordwell.

"That's it," replied the justice. "And it must have been some one interested for Arthur Wing."

must have been some one interested for Arthur Wing."

"I would like to suggest that this might not necessarily follow," said Detective Ordwell.

"The guilty man himself probably wrote that note. Most men who are willing to commit murder shrink from seeing an innocent man suffer in their stead."

"It seems to me," broke in one of the state detectives, "that the chances are that the Wing crowd did this trick. Look at the testimony that has been brought out here today! A paper known to have been in old Brett's pocketbook has been found on the floor of Arthur Wing's office. He has passed into the bank a mended bill that the treasurer had patched up a few days before for the squire. And now, here a note comes in, written on another piece of paper that must have been in the squire's possession the day he was killed. I figure that it all points toward Wing."

or paper that must have been in the squire's possession the day he was killed. I figure that it all points toward Wing."

"I shall certainly go back into court," said the county attorney, "and demand that Arthur Wing be held for the grand jury. I think the case demands it."

"I am not here as an advocate of Arthur Wing," said Detective Ordwell, "but I desire to draw the attention of the court to the fact to draw the attention of the court to the fact that all the evidence against the young man to this point is purely circumstantial. To be sure it links together after a fashion, but it is very inconclusive. The Mirror office is a public place and who may say what person dropped the paper there? Bank bills circulate through many hands in a few days. That note there may, of course, have been written on the bottom of one of the blank leases that the squire had on his person that day. But there are numbers of signed leases in various hands about town."

about town."

The weight of numbers, however, was against the detective. Furthermore, it was well understood that being engaged by the Erskine family he might be expected to be interested in their defence of Arthur Wing.

"I'll allow it isn't clear yet, one way or the other," admitted the justice, "but we seem to have hold of one end of the thread, and it's my opinion that we ought to keep pulling on it. It's better for Arthur Wing to have all this threshed out in court than to go along with all these stories and suspicions dogging after him."

these stories and suspicions dogging after him."

He went back into the court room with his little retinue, and after a whispered conference with the county attorney announced his decision, first making an explanation of the motives governing him. He stated to the crowd that the note purporting to come from the squire, was, in the minds of the officers concerned in the case, a rank imposture, but that it perhaps would lead to future developments. He said that he desired to bring no hardship upon anyone, but that after all these weeks of doubt and suspicion it was best to bring matters to a head, and let the law sift the evidence in court and under oath. Therefore he stated that he felt it best to hold Arthur Wing for trial, and he should be obliged to set the bonds at twenty thousand dollars on account of the serious nature of the charge.

Something like a gasp in chorus ran over the audience, and Arthur Wing arose and was about to speak. But the justice not unkindly advised him to say nothing, telling him that henceforth he must be guarded in his utterances. Court was then adjourned.

Meander Wing, his voice trembling with a father's solicitude and his face drawn with grief, canvassed the town for bondsmen. But the citizens were frightened at recent developments and bluntly or shamefacedly refused to assist.

opments and bluntly or shamefacedly refused to assist.

Sheriff Pettingill obligingly held his prisoner at the village hotel for twenty-four hours, hoping that the father would secure the bonds. But at noon he reluctantly told Meander that he must perform his duty. There was no prospect that bondsmen could be secured.

"I thought we had friends in this town, bub," said the old man as he sat in the bare little room at the hotel and rolled his hat in his hands, "but it don't look like it now. Cheer up, bub. Because you are over there in jail for a while doesn't signify that you belong there. As sure as God is in Heaven I'll find some way to get you out." He pressed Arthur's fingers with a shaking hand and hurried away before his son should see the tears that were running down over his wrinkled cheeks. A half hour before Arthur Wing started with the sheriff for the county jail Grace Erskine the sheriff for the county jail Grace Erskine called at the hotel. No one knew what passed between them, but the crowd that stood about the door when Wing stepped into the sheriff's team noticed that the young man's face wore new serenity.

"It's pretty hard work to believe that he done it," commented one of the loungers after the team had rattled away.

the team had rattled away.

"Human physogs are the most deceivin' things in this world," said Jason Dustin, the deputy sheriff. "You jest wait till this thing is all out and then see!"

"But jest notice how the Erskines are standin' behind him," objected the other. "They wouldn't be backin' up a man they thought had murdered their nearest relative, would they?"

had murdered their nearest relative, would they?"

"When ye come to wimmen's notions and prop'ty troubles 'tween the Erskines and George Brett, there hain't no tellin' what wimmen will do," was Jason's pessimistic reply. The two state detectives and their ally the reporter for the Daily Mail had suspiciously noted the fact that the elder Wing was not in the court room at the time of the hearing. In their minds they had promptly connected him with that mysterious missive that had been brought to the justice. As soon as court was adjourned they searched for the boy that had been before them and was leading the urchin down Water street in the direction of the woods in which the boy averred he had received the which the boy averred he had received the

"What's your name?" asked the detective.
"Chester Higgins."
"Where do you live?"
"Down on the bay shore, there beyond Purinton's mill.'

"How did you happen to be in the woods today?"

"How did you happen to be in the woods today?"

"Been clammin' over 'crost the Neck and was comin' home."

"How far is it to the place where the man gave you that paper?"

"Oh, a mile or tew mile or suthin' like that."

"Now I want you to go and show the place."

But the boy hung back rather surlily and looked stubbornly at the ground. "Oh, I'll pay you for the trip," the detective added.

"Wal, that's bus'ness" said the boy. As they walked along, the officer noted that despite his rags and bare feet, the boy had much intelligence in his weazened little face and that his eyes were coldly blue and shrewd.

"Pa lives down there," exclaimed the boy listlessly as they entered the scrubby pines. He pointed to a weather beaten cottage down across the rocky pasture at the edge of the water.

"What does your father do?" the detective

Oh, he lobsters and clams and hand-lines and picks up wood and drinks rum. Mother says if he'd stick to his other jobs as stiddy as he does to drinkin' rum we'd git to be well off in no time. But I like Pa. He uses me well. If I didn't like him he'd lick me till I did."

The two traversed a path leading through scrubby hemlocks until the boy paused and after looking around a little while said:
"I reckin it was about here that I got the let-

"Are you sure it was here?"
"Wal, it was about here somewhere."

"You ought to be able to remember back two hours better than that." The detective's tone was suspicious and the boy appeared to note the fact. He hastened to say. "These places along here look a good deal alike, mister, and I wasn't paying no partic'lar notice. I wasn't reckinin' I'd be yanked up here and asked all kinds of questions."

The detective seated himself and commenced to examine the boy in regard to the personal appearance of the man. But the urchin was vague. He would only say that the man was tallish and wore a false beard that was hitched under his chin by a string that went around his ears.

"What sort of clothes did he wear."

"Don't know

"You bet." said the boy with emphasis.

"You bet," said the boy with emphasis.
"I've read a grist of stories about them fellers."
The officer started back along the wood road in the direction of Purinton's mill. "Come along," he said "and we'll talk it over."
When they crossed the dam the officer felt that he had won the boy's confidence. They paused at the fence opposite the big door of the mill and the detective leaned against it carelessly with his eye on the entrance. But he kept on talking with the boy. Daniel Purinton came to the door at last, tugging a sack of meal that he threw into a farmer's waiting wagon. When Purinton straightened up Ordwell murmured to the boy in low tones, "Take a good look at the man there. Suppose he had those false whiskers on his face. Would he look any like the man that you saw in the woods?"
The boy stole a quick glance at the face of the detective. "Of course you understand, mister, that a feller can't be very sure about a matter of that sort but I really do think that if ye should put whiskers on that man there he'd look jest like the man that passed me that letter to carry."
"You are as sure about that as you can be?" the detective demanded.
"Yes, sir,"and the youth looked with great candor into the eyes of his interrogator.
"Now, bub, other persons will ask you some such questions as that but I want you to promise me that you will bluff them. Remember that you and I are two detectives working on this case together and we don't want to let other people in. Do you think you can bluff."

"I hain't tried very much," said the boy with a rather strange expression on his face, "but I reckin I can."

"Here's a dollar for your first fee," said Ordwell "and now look out how you answer questions."

questions."
"Yes sir!" and the boy slipped down over the bank and hastened off along the shore the bank and hastened off along the shore towards his home.

"That boy looks to be about forty years old every once in a while," mused the officer as he went on toward the village.

Carter, the shorter of the two state detectives, was posted in the window of Hawkes's store when Ordwell, his rival, parted from the boy. He had been awaiting their return. After Ordwell was safely past the store Carter hurried after the boy. But the youngster was then in an old dory pulling away along the shore toward a house Carter knew through Hawkes to be the domicile of "Rubber-boot" shore toward a house Carter knew through Hawkes to be the domicile of "Rubber-boot"

The detective was obliged to pick his way The detective was coniged to protect through the rock-strewn pasture. He saw Higgins and his son sitting behind the woodpile, deeply engrossed in conversation. "Rubber-boot Higgins," who was called thus on account of the unvarying nature of his foot gear, was a tall shambling man of the general no

"I have called to have a little talk with the boy about that business of the letter," commenced Carter.

"Yas, queer thing that," replied Higgins, scraping his rubber boots together to remove some mud. "Boy and I have just been talkin' it over. He don't know northin' but what he has said."

"I'd like to ask him a few questions. I—"
"Boy says he don't know northin' about the hing," persisted the father.

"I'd like to ask him a few questions. I—"
"Boy says he don't know northin' about the thing," persisted the father.
"What did the man look like?"
"Boy says he was tallish but he didn't notice northin' beyond that," broke in Higgins.
"Say, look here," snapped the detective, "I'm asking this boy about the matter. Wouldn't it be just as well to let him answer the questions himself?"
"Wal, he's my boy," growled Higgins.
"Yes, and I'm a state detective and I'll make trouble for you if you interfere with me in my duty," replied Carter. Higgins winced and went to whittling with much vigor. When the detective finally induced the boy to go back to the village with him the father made no protest audibly, though his looks were sufficiently ferocious. He simply threw this comment after the detective:
"Seems's if you are makin' a good deal of touse over ole Cale Brett. Why don't ye let him rest?"
Carter took the youth directly to the sidewalk opposite the Mirror office and waited until Meander Wing came shambling out.
"Look at that man—look hard," murmured the officer.
"Are you reminded of anything?" the detec-

the officer.

"Are you reminded of anything?" the detective asked at last.
"You mean about the letter—the man up in the woods?" the boy inquired.

"Yes, that's it."
"Wal—come to think—ye know a fellow can't be sure—but——"
"If that man had on those false whiskers—now think hard!"

"Wal, I vum, mister, now that you speak of it he seems to be jest about the same kind of man."

"Do you know who he is?"
"Oh, yes, that's old Wing the printer. Ye reckin he was tryin' to get Arthur out of the scrape, don't ye?" The boy threw a keen look at Carter. The detective held the boy by the arm. "Have you been talking old man Wing over with that detective I saw you with a little while ago?"
"His name was never spoken at all, mister.

"His name was never spoken at all, mister.

Never talked about him."

"Now, bub, if you'll stick it out and bluff that Ordwell—Can you bluff?"

"A little, I reckin," said the youngster moderally.

estly.

"Well, you bluff Ordwell and there'll be a good thing in it for you. Now run home and mind your eye."

mind your eye."

That evening after pondering long as to how much confidence he should place in the identification of the Higgins boy, Detective Ordwell decided to have a talk with Meander Wing.

Rather bluntly the detective asked the father why he had not been present at the hearing in the forence.

why he had not been present at the hearing in the forenoon.

"I did start for the court room" the old man said piteously, "but I didn't have the heart to go in. I knew they would ask the boy where he got that money and if he wouldn't tell me I knew he wouldn't tell them. I couldn't bear to be there and hear them tear at him. I went down in the pasture by the shore and staid till it was over. But now that Grace Erskine has told about the money," he said, regarding the officer wistfully, "I don't see that they have much to hold him on."

"It's the marked money and the paper they found in the office," explained Ordwell.

"Yes, but they might have been through other hands before they got to my son," cried the old man with some display of spirit.

"And there the thing hinges," said the detective quietly. "What sort of a man is Daniel Purinton," he asked with his characteristic bluntness.

Wing didn't seem to grasp the full meaning.

Purinton," he asked with his characteristic bluntness.

Wing didn't seem to grasp the full meaning of the detective's inquiry.

"Daniel is a square man in bus'ness dealin's," said Wing. "He 'tends to his own bus'ness and asks other people to 'tend to theirs."

"For instance, he will not admit where he got the money to pay for the repairs on the mill," suggested the detective.

"That's more or less like Daniel," admitted Wing. "He's sort of bull-headed and set in his ways."

"Has he been in your office since the squire disappeared?"

"Oh, yes; he has more or less business—advertising and job-work."

"He has paid money to you or to Arthur?"

"Yes, I'm quite sure that he has within the last few weeks. The office books will show it, anyway."

"And of course he had his pocket-book out?"

"Yes."

"I don't suppose you or Arthur ever notified that he desagged anything on the service."

"Yes."
"I don't suppose you or Arthur ever noticed that he dropped anything on the floor?"
"No, oh, no." Wing attempted to interject surprised inquiry but the detective kept on.
"Have you got specimens of Daniel Purinton's handwriting at your office?"

ton's handwriting at your office?"

"Yes."

"Well, I'll be around to see you tomorrow morning. In the meantime be very careful about saying anything about what we have been discussing,"

"I'll not say anything—but, Mr. Ordwell, you don't mean to hint that you suspect a man with Daniel Purinton's reputation, do you? Oh, it's impossible!"

"I don't care to assert what I suspect," said the officer, quietly, "but I have found that the detective who lets reputation stand in the way of investigation stops a great way short of knowing his business. The records show that good reputations get dreadfully jarred sometimes in criminal matters, Mr. Wing. Daniel Purinton may be a good man but he must take his raking over along with the rest of the good men of Mansfield village."

of Easter bon-bons. "The pretty companion again?"

"You are good at guessing," said Hilary.

"Yes—it is that precious Miss Eveleth, as grandmother calls her. Such folly!"

"Well?" Captain Mayne moved forward a chair for Miss Vaillant and took one himself.

"Here I am with cards already out for the most select and exclusive Easter masquerade in New York," frowned Hilary.

"Granted," murmured the Captain. "And I am fortunate enough to have received an invitation."

"And grandmother is determined to appear as Marie Antoinette, and drag that girl along as Princess Lambelle!"
"Ye fates!" commented Mayne, after a low whistle.

"Clement," said Hilary, after a moment's pause. "I've thought of a plan. You used to be something of an amateur chemist, didn't you?"

"Rather a dabster at the business," he ad-

"Rather a daoster at the business," he admitted.

"Couldn't you prepare me a good strong sleeping draught to settle the dear old lady for an hour or two, just until the ball is over! For then, of course, Princess Lambelle wouldn't have the face to appear alone."

"No, I should say not," spoke Mayne, slowly.
"But I say—why don't you ask Dr. Zellar?"

"Because I hate him," said Hilary, frankly.
"He's always making love to me, and I've refused him twice already!"

Mayne whistled a second time.
"I can't endure those fat, bald-headed men!" flashed Hilary. "I won't ask him anything. If you won't do it for me—"

"But I will," interrupted Mayne. "I dare say I can mix up something. I took a course of medical lectures once, as you know. For tonight?"

"I want her to have it about nine o'clook. I see give it to Mornie myself," will hilary.

"I want her to have it about nine o'clock. I can give it to Morris myself," said Hilary, can give it to Morris myself," said Hilary, eagerly.

"My lady's mandate is my pleasure," bowed Mayne, and then as Hilary gathered up her wraps, he departed.

"She treats me somewhat like an apothecary's boy," he pondered. "But she is Miss Vaillant, and some day I mean that she shall be my wife!"

And so, about eight that evening, the page brought up a packet containing a small green phial. "From the druggist's, miss," said he. "For Mrs. Towers, care of Miss Hilary."

Hilary was sitting under her hair-dresser's hands. "It's all right," said she, coloring.

As soon as she could escape she went to her grandmother's room, where the old lady and Flossie were turning over a pile of French engravings of the time of Louis XVI, to verify the costumes that Mrs. Towers had just received, and beckoned Morris into the hall.

"Morris," said she, "my grandmother is exciting herself too much, Dr. Zellar says. Here is a strong sleeping draught that you must give her."

"But, miss," stammered the maid, "Dr.

"But, miss," stammered the maid, "Dr. Zellar left a powder this morning for the same purpose—a quieting mixture, miss." Hilary winced—she had not anticipated this. She paused a second.
"Never mind," she said, tartly. "Dr. Zellar "Never mind," she said, tartly. "Dr. Zellar has changed his prescription.

"Half of it nov. The rest at ten!"
"But, miss—the ball! My missis says—"
"Dr. Zellar disapproves of the ball for her.
But, Morris, this is between you and me alone!"
"Certainly miss" cold at a factorial and me alone."

"Certainly, miss," said Morris. She had taken commands from Miss Vaillant before, and knew her imperious nature.

As Hilary ran down the stairs, the old lady's bell tinkled sharply.

"Morris—my tonic! We are half an hour late now!"

"The Lord be provided."

"The Lord be praised for that," said Morris, inwardly, and she hastened to pour half the contents of the phial into an engraved tumbler.

Mrs. Towers eyed it sharply. "The color has altered—what is the matter with it?" said she. "The doctor has changed the prescription, ma'am," said Morris, glibly, and Mrs. Towers drank it, unquestioningly.

"Insipid tasting enough," said she. "Is the costume ready, Morris? Did you put on those ribbons?"

"Yes ma'am an hourage Here it is ma'am."

"Yes, ma'am, an hour ago. Here it is, ma'am."
But in the examination of Marie Antoinette's exquisite robe, Mrs. Towers grew strangely sleepy. "It's singular how drowsy I am," said she. "Ithink it's Flossie's example that has infected me."
For Flossie had sunk into a brief slumber on

"Be sure to wake me at ten," said the old lady. "Two—hours—to—dress—and——"
"Yes'm—certainly'm' soothed Morris. "Bless me, she's asleep already!"
She dozed over her needlework that evening until it was long past ten, and, waking with a start, she tiptoed to her mistress's room. Mrs. Towers was still asleep, but Flossie sat reading by the shaded lamp.

by the shaded lamp.
"Ought not Mrs. Towers to be roused? Isn't it time for her to dress?" she asked, glancing at the clock.

"La, she's dead asleep still," said the maid,
"and I was to give her the second dose at ten."

"Yes," said Flossie, calmly. "I heard Miss Vaillant say so, and I gave it to her myself at ten, though it was almost impossible to arouse ner."

"Well, miss, she always did sleep sound," said Morris, again rubbing her hands. "And if she can get a quiet night's rest, it is a good thing, 1'm sure."

"But she told me to call her early," protested Flossie. "She wishes to enter the salon at midnight. There are some carriages driving up already."

"But the doctor was dead against her going to the bull toright," interpretable of the control of th Flossie.

"I have Miss Vaillant's orders, ma'am," persisted Morris, who could be unpleasantly pert when she pleased.

And Flossie said nothing more.

Morris was still plaiting pink satin ribbon for Mrs. Tower's neglige and Flossie sat listening to the strains of the Hungarian band and the soft tumult and rustle below, when the clock struck one.

and the soft tumuit and rustle below, when the clock struck one.

"I guess I'd better undress her for the night," said Morris, putting away her work basket, "if you'd please keep out of sight, miss, for if sees you, she'll want to talk and I'll never get her ready for bed."

"She'll hear the music," said Flossie.

"No, she won't—she get's harder o' hearin' every day," asserted Morris. "It's a way old folks has." She nodded authoritatively towards the door she nodeed authoritatively towards the door and Flossie unwillingly obeyed, for Morris was something of a tyrant in her way.

The band was playing one of Strauss's wild waltzes, and merry voices floated up where Flossie stood opposite her bedroom door. Not that she wished to be one of the dancers—her heart was still sore for her lost mother and she was most retiring in her nature, but Flossie was most retiring in her nature, but Flossie was young and at times very lonely, and a single tear trickled like a stray pearl down her cheek, when suddenly a smothered scream from Mrs. Tower's room rent the air! "Morris, what is the matter?" she cried.
"I—I can't wake Mrs. Towers up, miss!" stammered the terrified maid with a livid pallor on her cheeks. "I've called and shook her and everything!"
"Let me try," said Flossie, smiling at what she deemed Morris's folly. "I can always rouse her with a word."

her with a word."

But the instant she saw Mrs. Towers's face in the strong electric light that Morris had turned on, she knew that nothing short of the last trump could rouse that sleeper.

For she lay there, dead and cold!

CHAPTER IX.

CHAPTER IX.

Down stairs the Hungarian Band pulsed weirdly and the feet of flying dancers skimmed over the waxed floors, and nobody noticed at first that one by one, people were beckoned out from behind stealthily litted draperies, so that it was sometime before Mr. Van Alden, the floor manager, made a public announcement that supper would be served at once, after which the second part of the programme would be omitted, owing to the illness of Mrs. Tressilian Towers. People stared and wondered, but they ate their supper with none the less appetite, and departed decorously, leaving polite messages of regret. And not until the next morning did they know what had really happened! happened!

happened!
As it chanced, Dr. Zellar was among the guests. He had arrived late and Mrs. Vaillant had taken him up to her mother's room.

"Oh, doctor!" cried she, frantically. "Tell us that it is only a swoon. She can't be—dead!"

"She is dead, most assuredly," said the doctor, as he touched her pulse and lifted the heavy eyelids. "What has she taken?"

"Just the same as usual," faltered Hilary, who had grown ghastly pale. "Morris will tellyou."

"It was Miss Field gave her the last dose!" squeaked the pusillanimous Morris, "as she'll squeaked the pusillanimous Morris, "as she'll tell you herself, sir."

Flossie, who sat by the bedside, holding the hand of her dead friend, raised her tear-stained even at the appeal

"Certainly I did," said she quietly. "There's the phial on the dressing table—the dark green one."

Dr. Zellar took out the cork and tasted the few drops that remained. He frowned slightly. "Some one has been tampering with the case," said he. "This is a powerful opiate." "It's the medicine you prescribed yourself, doctor," gasped Hilary, paler than ever. "No it is not," said he, sternly. "It is far too powerful a mixture for so old a person. It bears no doctor's name nor druggist's stamp. Who has dared—"
Then there was a little commotion in the Then there was a little commotion in the room. Hilary Vaillant had fainted, but Dr. Zellar's glance was on Flossie Field. She did not look like a guilty person, he thought.

"You gave her the medicine, you say?" he questioned, sternly.
"Yes."
"Who authorized you?"
"I heard Miss Vaillant tell the maid that she was to have it at eight o'clock and then at ten. Morris did not come in at ten, so I myself took the responsibility."

"Did you know what it was?"
"No—but Miss Vaillant was my authority. I

For Flossie had sunk into a brief slumber on the cushioned sofa where the pink silk draperies shielded her tired eyes.

"Well, ma'am," said the artful Morris, rubbing her hands, "I don't think it would be a bad idea for you to get a little beauty s'eep too. It's early, ma'am, and you always look better after you've had your nap."

"Perhaps I will," said Mrs. Towers, letting her royal fripperies fall in a glittering heap to the floor, and in a minute Morris had slipped on her satin dressing robe and placed her among the lace pillows.

He sat down at a little table and calmly wrote out the certificate: "Death from senile aesthenia."

aesthenia."
"Doctor!" gasped Mrs. Vaillant, who had just returned from deluging Hilary with cologne and smelling salts. "What does this signify! The certificate, I mean."
"Signify!" repeated the doctor, brusquely.
"Why it signifies death from old age. What else would you call it? Wagn?t ahe poorly.

pleaded the mother. "She is so ill!"
Dr Zellar followed Mrs. Vaillant into Hilary's room. At the same instant Morris called her mistress out, and the physician stood looking down at Hilary.

"Well!" said he sharply. "What does all this mean, young lady?"
It is said that a little wholesome brusqueness is an excellent cure for hysterics. In Hilary Vaillant's case it proved so.

"I—I didn't mean any harm!" gasped the girl, shrinking from the oblique flame of his keen gray eyes. "I wanted to keep grandmother up stairs—away from the bail, you know—she and her companion, Miss Field." "Oh!" said Zellar, savagely. "So you took it upon yourself to imperil my reputation and risk my patient's life to gratify a whim like that! A very smart thing to do!" Hilary covered her eyes with her hands. "Oh, don't speak so terribly, doctor!" sobbed she. "Do you know what the courts of law would call this, Miss Vaillant?" Hilary uttered a wail of terror. "Oh, doctor

"Yet you would have let that pretty young thing, the companion, suffered for your crime, if you could," snarled he. "Don't deny it! I'm not a fooi!"

Miss Vaillant rose trembling from the sofa and threw herself on ner knees at his feet. "Mercy! Mercy!" she pleaded.

"Ah, you are at my feet, now" he sneered! "Well, young lady, I will be merciful—to you and to the Vaillants,—on one condition only—that you become my wife within three months. I know you are selfish and silly,—that I shall have to watch you as a cat watches a mouse. But I don't believe you'll dare to experiment on me."

"Oh, I can't! I can't!" sobbed the girl.

"Well, why not? I can give you a good home and all the money you want. It's not every one who would extend such terms to—no, I won't repeat the word. But I love you in spite of everything. ## CHAPTER X.

"But where is Flossie Field?" said Mrs. Jov-The funeral carriages were at the door to

The funeral carriages were at the door to convey the family and their friends to Woodlawn Cemetery, and the minister's wife, with her foot on the step asked the question of Mrs. Vaillant, a black draped, drooping figure. Wasit not bad enough to lose her mother so suddenly, that she should also within the last hour have learned that the lovely daughter, to the step of the step wash not but should also within the last hour have learned that the lovely daughter, to whom she looked to raise the family fortunes still higher by making an aristocratic marriage, had plighted herself to a fussy, baldheaded little doctor, whose only recommendations were his professional skill and a little money he had contrived to scrape together thereby.

"He must have cast some sort of a spell over Hilary," said her mother. "I cannot account for it, otherwise."

"Flossie?" Mrs. Vaillant repeated, vaguely. "We never thought of her, I don't see why she should be here."

"Because she loved Mrs. Towers, and Mrs. Towers loved her,"said Mrs. Joycotte.

Mrs. Vaillant frowned. "She was the cause of my mother's death," said she.

"Not in the least," spoke Mrs. Joycotte, decidedly. "It was all the fault of that stupid maid for misunderstanding Miss Vaillant's directions. Of course you have discharged her."

"No, we haven't," stammered Mrs. Vaillant. "We couldn't spare Morris—she has been with us for years. She is to be Hilary's maid now. Such a devoted servant!"

"All this is very extraordinary," said Mrs. Joycotte, curtly.

"The woman talks as if she didn't believe me," thought poor Mrs. Vaillant. But in her own heart she herself found it very difficult to understand Hilary's determination to retain Morris in her service.

me," thought poor Mrs. Vaillant. But in her own heart she herself found it very difficult to understand Hilary's determination to retain Morris in her service.

From an upper window, Flossie Field was sadly watching the carriages drive away. To her the world seemed looming up more cruel and cold than ever. What should she do next? Whither should she go?

With swimming eyes she turned away, just as Morris bounced into the room with a card. "For Miss Field," said she. "Though I'm sure I don't know why he should call. And if I might make so bold, it ain't a good thing for a young person as has lier living to make in service to go receiving calls from them as is so far above her."

But Flossie's eyes suddenly brightened as she read the name:—"Mr. Geoffrey Marchlands," "Ain't you goin' to change your frock nor nothin'?" said Morris, staring.

Without any reply, Flossie went into the dark and silent drawing room, feeling as though she trod on air.

"I am so glad to see you, Mr. Marchlands," she uttered, impetuously.

"I need advice so much," she faltered. "And I have no one to consult."

"Advice? About what?"

"About my future. Everyone is looking askance at me, though I do not know what I have done to deserve it, and there is nothing more for me to do here. If you could recommend me to another place—I can't go back to Mrs. Joycotte again—she has been too kind already, and I must decide on something. No—I cannot accept pecuniary aid" as he was about to speak "for I know that you too are poor—"

"Poor is a comparative term," said Marchlands, slowly. "Yes, in some ways I am poor—for instance, I have no near relatives and but few friends. So you are willing to trust to my advice, Miss Field?"

Flossie lifted her frank eyes to his face with deepening color. "Yes, in everything," she spoke.

"And I pledge you my word "said he "to

"And I pledge you my word," said he, "to prove worthy of your faith. But—Flossie—" Again she raised her sweet, questioning eyes.

"I mean that I want you to be my dearly be-loved wife, Flossic. Can you trust me as far as that?"

He took her tenderly and reverently in his arms—she came to them like a lost child that sees its home at last!

"Oh!" she faltered. "I am so happy,—so happy!"

"Then you really love me, Flossie?"

"Then you really love me, Flossie?"

"I have loved you ever since—ever since that first day when I knocked over your picture. Do you remember, Mr. Marchlands."

"Geoffrey, if you please, my darling. I bought it for my collection,—it wasn't so bad. Now I shall treasure it for ever!"

"You, Geoffrey! Bought it? But I thought you were a poor young artist!"

"An artist, dearest, I own, but not so very poor. I have enough for us both, and to spare, in my English home. When may I take you there, Flossie, my sweetheart, my cherished one!"

"It's very strange!" said Mrs. Joycotte, from whose house Flossie was married. "I thought of course the child knew about Castle Marchlands and its great iron mines, and the famous picture gallery and all,—but it seems she didn't. And here is Hilary Vaillant, the beauty of the season, going to marry that pompous little doctor, when I know she worshipped the very ground that Marchlands trod on. And Captain Mayne has suddenly gone to Australia without a farewell word to anybody! There is something here I don't understand at all. But one thing I do know—that Flossie is the happiest girl in the world, and she deserves it all, God bless her!" (THE END.)

They Can Be Quickly Cured.

Anyone having consumption need no longer fear deadly results or think of leaving home as we have investigated the claims of the Kalamazoo Tuberculosis Remedy Co., 261 Main St., Kalamazoo, Mich, and find that they are warranted in saying that their discovery of the Copper Cure or Antidotum Tuberculose as it is known by scientists will cure in your own home any case of consumption that exists anywhere no matter how long it has been in the system. The discovery is a Godsend to humanity for it quickly cures and puts a step to this most dreaded of all diseases without the expense of travel and simply by the use of that harmless mineral copper.

We have watched the good work and can speak in highest praise of it as it is endorsed by eminent men all over the world and the chairman of the company is O. K. Buckhout, the noted men ber of the British Tuberculosis Congress of world-famous men who make consumption a life study. Like magic it stops the hawking, coughing and spitting, the hemorrhages, night sweats, pains in the chest fever, weak voice, flushed complexion, wasting away of the flesh, etc., which are the prominent symptoms of consumption. The very same heavensent blessing was the means of curing A. H. Dingley, a son of Congressman Dingley of Dingley Tariff Bill fame, who went all over this country. Europe and Australia for relief and couldn't get it and came back with death staring him in the face and was finally cured by Antidotum Tuberculose after all else had failed. It cured Mr. John Devries of galloping consumption, P. Adrian Die, 188 So. West St., of quick consumption, Paul de Smith of Dalton and ladies who had wasted away to mer skeletons.

About Flowers. All

BY EBEN E. REXFORD.

Desirability of Bulbs. Every garden should have its collection of bulbs because from them we get not only brilliant and beautiful flowers in great profusion, but we get them at a time when the garden would be a cheerless place without them. They tide over the long period between the going of the snow and the coming of the ordinary spring flowers.

coming of the ordinary spring flowers with a prolific display of bloom which is all the more appreciated because it comes at a time when there is nothing to rival it. Now-a-days bulbs cost but little, and every lover of fine flowers can afford them. Indeed, those who love beautiful flowers can not afford to be without them

Chrysanthemums.

If these plants have been growing in the ground during the summer, they should be potted the first part of the month. It is a good plan to cut around each plant about ten days before lifting them with a sharp, thin-bladed spade. Make the cut about the size of the pot the plant is to go into. This severs the long roots, and forces them to send out new ones inside the bale of earth, and puts the plant in the best possible condition for lifting because the old roots will not have to be interfered with at potting-time, and the new roots will act as feeders.

As a general thing, but little potting-soil will (EDITOR'S NOTE: It is the intention of the editor to have this department practical and useful in all ways. It will deal with the matter of gardening, both out and indoors, in a way calculated to be helpful to the woman who can have but a small garden, or a few pot plants. In order to make it of the greatest possible benefit to those women who love flowers quite as well as those who have a great deal of time to devote to their culture, Mr. Rexford, who is a recognized authority on this subject, will undertake to answer all questions they may ask, to the best of his ability. If there is anything you want to find out about flowers, tell him what it is, and perhaps he can furnish you with the desired information. Anyvay he will do his best to do so, and as your questions will be answered through these columns they will be of interest to all "Comfort" readers. Address, Eben E. ### Bulb Planting.

HIS is the best month in which to plant bulbs in the garden. As a general thing work of this kind is put off until considerably later in the season because the amateur is under the impression that bulbs planted anytime before the coming of cold weather will do as well. This is not the case, however. In order to achieve the best results, bulbs must be got into the ground as early as possible. The reason for early planting is this bulbs form roots during the fail from which the early growth of the following season is supported. Such a growth would take place before they can properly perform the work of the season. If you plant them early, strong, healthy root-growth can, and will, be completed before the coming of cold weather, and the plants will be ready when spring comes to devote all their energies to the development of a fine crop of flowers. But if we do not plant our bulbs until late in the season they will only have fairly begun to make roots when winter comes and puts an end to their work. In spring it will be necessary for them to take it up where they left it off, and this will go on at a time when they are trying to produce flowers, thus taxing them to a greater extent than they are able to stand satisfactorily. Late-set bulbs invariably give inferior flowers if any, and they are so weakened by the over-taxing of their vitality that they seldom recover from the check. Therefore plant early and give your bulbs a chance to fully complete the work of the season before cold weather comes.

Bulb-Beds.

Choose a location that is naturally well-drained if possible. If it is not so, excavate the soil to the depth of a foot and a half and fill in with four or five inches of something that will not decay—old crockery, brick, coal-slag, small stones, anything that will prevent the soil from settling down again as it was before you began work at it. This stratum of porous material will allow surplus water from the soil above to filter off through it, thus doing away with the danger of injury to the bulbs planted in it from undue retention of moisture in spring.

When the soil thrown out of the bed is returned to it, work it over thoroughly to make it fine and mellow. If rather heavy, because of clay, it is an excellent plan to add enough sharp, coarse sand to make it friable. Also add to it, while working it over, a liberal amount of old, well-rotted barnyard fertilizer, if you can get it. Nothing suits bulbs better than cow manure which has lain until it is black and crumbling, and the country gardener has the advantage of the city flower-lover because he can almost always get this ideal fertilizer with but little trouble. If it cannot be obtained I would advise bonedust as a substitute. Use in the proportion of a pound to each square very de soil if it is of ordinary richness. If Use in the proportion of a pound to each square yard of soil if it is of ordinary richness. If poor, double the amount.

Planting.

Put Tulips and Hyacinths about four inches under the surface at the north. The smaller bulbs should be planted about three inches deep. Set the larger bulbs about six inches apart. Small varieties are more effective when grouped and planted closely. What we should aim at is a mass of color, and this can only be secured by close planting.

Avoid mixing

Avoid mixing kinds in the bed The most satisfactory results are always secured by keeping each kind by itself.
There is a lack of harmony in general habit which makes a discord of the beds in which tulips, hyacinths and daf-fodils are jumbled together.

Protection.

Just before cold weather sets in, cover the bulb beds well with coarse manure or something similar. This is not to keep the cold out as so many suppose, rather to keep it in. Frost, if it stays in a comparatively tender plant will not injure it, but if the sun warms the soil enough to extract the frost during the day, and freezing takes place at night, injury is sure to result because of the alternation of cold and heat in which runture of the plant cold and heat in which rupture of the plant cells is likely to take place. It is the frequent alternation of conditions which does the mischief, not the cold, as most persons believe. Unless bulb-beds are given protection, the soil in which they are exposed under the action of frost and often the bulbs are heaved from their places, and their roots torn off. Be sure to give a covering of some sort.

roots will act as feeders.

As a general thing, but little potting-soil will be needed because the earth which is lifted with the plants will fill the pots, but if any is used to fill in about the roots, let it be rich with bone dust. Endeavor to and exposing roots. To guard against this, water the plants well before lifting. When you have them in their pots, set them in a cool, airy, shaded place, and shower them well. Do

A. N.—Ivory, the much praised new Rose, has not been tried very extensively as a bedder, as yet, but being a slip from Golden Gate, it probably partakes to some extent of the characteristics of that variety, and would likely give satisfactory results in the garden.

During the past year portions of Indian Territory were opened to settlement by the Government allotment of lots by chance, and the scenes that were enacted in the years gone by, when Oklahoma was the objective point of settlers from east and west, north and south, were again presented in a much more exciting manner. A Kansas telephone girl luckily secured a lot valued at $17,000, and others were nearly as octunate.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE IDIOT'S STORY.

HOUGH the pursuers were almost on them, Archie had no idea of leaving Daisy behind. He reined in his horse, threw himself from the saddle, and unslung his rifle.

Half a dozen painted demons were almost upon him, but he raised his repeating Winchester and sent half a dozen shots among them, which checked their headlong advance. One saddle was emptied, two horses were down, and the others had cought a fety in flight.

which checked their headlong advance. One saddle was emptied, two horses were down, and the others had sought safety in flight.

He ran to Daisy, just as her horse began to kick and struggle in death. Seizing the insensible girl about the waist, he drew her away from the horse and laid her upon the leaves beneath a wide-spreading beach.

Crouching down by the foot of the tree, he determined to defend her with his life.

Fortunately he had brought some ammunition with him, and he had the presence of mind to slip a few cartridges into his gun during the lall in the attack.

Captain Snell, who had been one of the party that was chasing Ned Todd, on learning that there was a man and a woman about to make their way to the camp, had abandoned the chase after the borderer and turned his attention toward the youth and Daisy.

"Catch them, but do the girl no harm. A thousand dollars to the man who takes the girl unharmed!"

This stimulus was sure to bring about the desired result, he thought, and doubtless it would have but for the fact that the youth had shown a decided intention to take care of himself.

Placing Daisy out of the reach of their bullets, he crouched behind the old beech tree and sent shot after shot with such precision into their ranks that the Indians for the second sent shot after shot with such precision into their ranks that the Indians for the second time fell back.

"Death and fury!" roared the road agent chief. "Are you all a set of cowards? Look, see! the boomers are arming, and we shall soon have twenty-five or thirty blazing away at us. On him! take him! There's enough, now all together!"

He had brought up his road agents and Cheyenne warriors, about sixty or seventy in number. There was not a ghost of a show for the youth, for he knew that it would be impossible for the boomers to reach him before they had overwhelmed him in numbers. But he resolved to defend himself to the last.

Again he had taken advantage of the lull in the attack to reload the empty chambers of his gun, and with cocked rifle waited for a renewal of the attack, which he understood would be his death struggle. Daisy had regained her consciousness, and realizing it all, asked:

"Is it not over yet?"

"No, but it soon will be. Here they come

"No, but it soon will be. Here they come now. Good by."

The great line of horsemen coming on at a

The great line of horsemen coming on at a sweeping gallop, bore down upon him. They were almost within gunshot when suddenly a wild shout rose on the air, and a withering volley was poured into their ranks. The youth sprang to his feet, amazed at the sudden attack. Bursting out from a wood near, was half a hundred blue-coated cavalry, headed by the irrepressible Ned Todd himself.

"Whoop, horoay! give it to them boys," shouted the borderer, dashing away at the head of the column, waving his hat in the air.

The soldiers followed, their guns and pistols flashing death at every jump. Saddles were flashing death at every jump. Saddles were emptied and the ground soon covered with men and horses. The bewildered red skins halted for a single moment, wavered and then broke

But that moment of hesitation was fatal to them. The cavalry was among them, and their bright sabres doing sad havoc. Utterly disheartened and terrified, they fled in every direction.

"What is it? what does it mean?" Daisy asked from where she lay.

"Deliverance has come," the youth shouted. "Soldiers are here and we are safe. Lie close to the ground and do not stir, lest you get hit with a bullet."

She obeyed him and kept close to the earth. The boomers came to their aid also, and the Indians and road agents were driven away or killed, for but little pains were taken to take captives. "Well, boy, are you all right?" asked Ned captives.

"Well, boy, are you all right?" asked Ned Todd, dashing up to where the youth stood, ready to spend his last drop of blood in the defense of Daisy Miller.

"Yes, untouched," was the answer,

"And the girl?"

"Not badly injured. They shot my horse and I was slightly bruised by the fall," Daisy answered, springing to her feet.

"Well, I am glad to know it is no worse. When they got onto our racket so quick, and deserted me to follow you, I was afraid that after all our plan would be a failure."

"It would but for the soldiers. Where did you find them?" the youth asked.

"They were in the wood, into which I was chased, watching the Indians. There was something about them that was rather suspicious, they thought."

The boomers had by this time come up, and invited all to their camp. They went, and there Daisy found many acquaintances. There were those who had not yet heard of her father's awful death, and her own captivity. She was regarded as one returned from the dead. They were glad to have her with them once They were glad to have her with them once more, and as she was weak and worn out, some good and nourishment was given her and then the best bed in the camp furnished her. Na-ture too long kept at a strain gave way, and in an hour after Daisy Miller was in the camp she was in a high fever.

A surgeon, by chance, was with the troop, and he at once administered medicine to her.

"Do you think that she is in a critical condi-tion, doctor?" asked Archie Holland.
"I cannot tell yet," he answered. "She is young and may come out all right. I hope so at all events."

Archie went away from the tent in which the Archie went away from the tent in which the sick girl lay, with a heavy feeling in his heart. Now that the road agents and Cheyennes had been dispersed and driven away, the Oklahoma boomers learned that there was another unpleasant surprise for them. The soldiers had come to drive them out of the country.

"It seems very hard, after we have braved so much and come here in this wilderness and built our homes, to be driven away," said one old boomer.

built our homes, to be driven away," said one old boomer.

"I know that it seems hard," answered the officer in charge of the troops. "But we have our duty to perform, and we must do it. We shall give you a few days anyway, until the young lady can be removed, and then we shall have you returned to the States."

Archie heard this and he felt as if he could almost shed tears for these people. Someone touched his arm. He turned about and saw Ned Todd.

"What is it, Ned?"

almost sheat dears for these people. Someone touched his arm. He turned about and saw Ned Todd.

"What is it, Ned?"
"I say, now that these troops are going to stay here a week or two, wouldn't it be a good idea to get some of them and go back to that cabin where the idiot cripple is. I believe that from him we can get the secret of your father's mysterious disappearance."
"But would they go?"
"I know that the captain would send at least a dozen with us. That would be enough."
"But—but Daisy?"
"Oh, she will be well taken care of. Don't forget the original object of this visit."
Archie felt a little guilty that he should have to be reminded that his father was somewhere in that vast wilderness a prisoner.
"I will ask him; we will go!" he said. "That matter must not be given up."
They went to the captain and told him of their plan. The captain listened to it and when they were through, he said:
"I don't know that it will be acting in accordance to my orders."
"When you are so far from headquarters do you always wait to act upon orders? Does not the department sometimes give you latitude, some discretion?" asked Ned Todd.
"Oh, yes."
"Well, if ever latitude was given, it should be on this occasion. You have no time now to quibble about orders. Everything must be done now or never."
"Well, Major Todd, how many men will it done now or never."

"Well, Major Todd, how many men will it require?"

"A dozen under a brave discreet officer, will be sufficient."

"Then you shall have them."

"When can we start?"

"As soon as you choose. In the morning if you wish."

"Tonight would be better."

"Tonight would be better."

"Tonight would be better."
"Very well; tonight be it then."
"Will you permit the men to volunteer?"
"Yes, any that wish to. Go and talk with them. See Sergeant Staves."
The sergeant was found and he was very anxious to be one of the party to go and exterminate such a formidable band of road agents as these in Oklahoma had proved to be. They had been guilty of robbing the United States mail on divers occasions, and sacking frontier villages. villages.

villages.

"Yes, sir, you can count on me," said the soldier. "I would just like to be at such a frolic as that will be."

Twelve stout, brave young fellows were selected out of the command, and when armed with carbines and revolvers they prepared to set out for the strange cabin in the wilderness, as soon as it was dark.

Archie again called at the tent where the poor, delirious Daisy lay. She was sleeping, but her fever was very high.

"What do you think of her case?" he asked of the army surgeon.

"What do you think of her case?" he asked of the army surgeon. "She is doing very well, I think, yet I have not had her under my care long enough for much change to take place. I hope that her fever may go down during the night." It was a trying ordeal to go away that night and leave Daisy still in a critical condition, but if they should wait until she recovered they could not have the assistance of the soldiers. At midnight the entire party, mounted on

At midnight the entire party, mounted on fresh horses, set out for the mysterious cabin in the forest. All night long they traveled without any incident worthy of mention, and at dawn of day halted in a large wood, where they remained in camp until noon, allowing their horses to rest and taking some sleep

About two o'clock in the afternoon the horses were again saddled and the small cavalcade started once more on the long, toilsome march. To Archie Holland, who was unaccustomed to such travel, the fatigue was almost too much.

such travel, the fatigue was almost too much. Nothing but his indomitable will kept him up during the journey.

At dusk they halted again, and gave their horses a chance to graze for an hour, and partook of some supper. Ned Todd, who acted as guide for the party, said that they could not be more than ten miles from the log cabin.

"What time will we reach it?" Archie asked.

"About midnight," he answered.

"That will be the best time to strike 'em' said the sargeant. "They won't be looking for us then, and we'll come on 'em unawares.

"That will be the best time to strike 'em" said the sargeant. "They won't be looking for us then, and we'll come on 'em unawares. We'll be apt to find 'em all asleep."

"If we can get the cripple away from them before they do him any harm, our secret will, I believe, be obtained. He can tell me where my father is, but if they should suspect that he is not the idiot he pretends to be they would kill him. We must take him away alive and unharmed."

After a halt of a couple of hours, the cavel-narmed."

After a halt of a couple of hours, the cavalcade again saddled their horses, and were once more on their way through the trackless forest toward the strange cabin in the wilderness.

Ned Todd, the irrepressible borderer, rode in front, guided by his meagre knowledge of the country. He knew that they must be near the cabin, but again and again found himself at fault, and thus kept the party wandering about in the wood until three or four o'clock in the morning, before they came in sight of the

The moon had by this time risen and the sky being clear, filled the wood with light. They entered by the very same road which Todd and Archie had entered on their first visit to the Archie had entered on their first visit to the place.

The great log cabin seemed very quiet. Not a sign of a living being was to be seen and Archie was asking himself if it was deserted.

The officer commanded them to dismount, which they did. Three men were left to hold the horses and the others advanced on foot to the cabin. First the house was surrounded, and then Todd, the sergeant, and two or three of the soldiers advanced to the door.

As they came to it someone inside the building, doubtless awakened from sleep by the tramping of feet, opened the door and gave utterance to a yell.

"Halt!" cried Todd, leaping toward the aperture.

"Hait!" cried fodd, leaping toward the aperture.

Crack! went a pistol, and the bullet struck the buckle of the scout's belt.

"Come on, boys, here they are," Ned Todd shouted, and with a kick from his ponderous boot, he sent the door flying from its hinges. "Here they are! down with them!"

Then it seemed as if a pandemonium reigned within the house. Yells, oaths and groans mingled with pistol shots, made the night hideous. A cloud of black smoke rose from within and around the building, and masses of fighting, struggling men at last burst through the doors and windows of the building, and the conflict which had begun inside, was renewed in the yard about the house. From door and windows there sprung dark forms, and the flash of pistols and clash of steel was almost incessant. almost incessant.

almost incessant.

"Here they are, sweep them from the face of the earth!" yelled the irrepressible Ned Todd, rushing like a cyclone through the building. One man rose from the floor and fired at him, but Ned seemed to hold a charmed life. Placing his own pistol at his would-be slayer's breast, he shot him dead, and then bounded over the body, pressing the others in so closely that they were compelled to beat a retreat to that they were compelled to beat a retreat to

They went thundering through the apartment where the idiot lay kicking and giggling with infinite delight. On, out into the rear yard, where the bandits halted for a last fight, Todd and Capt. Snell met face to face.

"Aha! it's you, meddlesome fool, that we have to thank for this," cried Snell. "Take that for your pains," and raising his pistol he snapped it in the face of the scout. It was well for Todd that it missed fire, for had it not it would have sent him to eternity.

"It's my time, now," he cried, and then with his own pistol he shot down the chief of road agents.

At this moment the flames were seen leaping out of the cabin, and Todd turning to Archie, cried:

The combat was by this time over. The road agents were either slain or had fled. Four or five bodies lay within the light of the burning building, their pale faces upturned to the sky. Archie recognized one among them, and going to his side bent over the body of the dying man.

"Oh, brother, brother!" he whispered, "don't you know me? Speak but one word to ask forgiveness, that I may have some hope for you in the future. Speak, oh, speak!"

The dying man opened his eyes, and looked upon the face gazing in pity and kindness upon him. But he did not utter a word. That tongue so long guilty of sin and deceit, was paralyzed and silenced forever.

paralyzed and silenced forever.

"Speak, Ralph; oh, speak, and tell me where my father is. Oh, do tell me where I shall find my father!"

The man gazed at him a moment with a wild vacant stare, and then as the death shadows crept over his frame, a strange shudder convulsed his form. He was dying.

"Archie, Archie Holland," called a voice, and looking about the youth discovered to his utter amazement, the cripple sitting up. "Don't you know me?" he said.

"No."

"I do not wonder at it, I have changed so much. A change brought about by suffering and torture. I have a story to tell you all."
They gathered about the man who had sufered so much, and with breathless interest listened, while he narrated a story that seemed so wild so impossible of belief that they would almost be inclined to doubt it, but for the con-

"Several years ago, I was one of the wealthiest cattle men in the West," he began. "I had a wife and one child, a bright-eyed son, in the States. I had a step-son, who proved to be my inveterate enemy. I gave him employment with my herds in the West, and he ran away from me, and I never heard of him for months. I did not dream that a band of road agents, that was at that time and has ever since been a that was at that time and has ever since been that was at that time and has ever since been a terror and dread to the entire country, was under his control, but such was the fact. I de-termined to quit business in the West, and sold out my cattle, receiving in gold three hundred thousand dollars for them. I started for the nearest railroad station to go to the States, when I was pursued by the road agents, who had become aware of the amount of money I carried with me, and chased to within twenty five miles of this place, where my faithfu guide was murdered and I made captive. Be fore I was captured however, I managed to conceal my money where it has not been found to this day. I was brought to this cabin, and here tortured and burned with hot irons to tell where the money was buried, until I am the wretched helpless cripple that you see. My feet are only clubs, and my hands almost use less. But I kept my secret, and was thrown into a fever from my suffering, from which when I recovered I pretended to be an idiot. Believing that I was an idiot they ceased to

Pinwheel Circle.

This little wheel may be used for a variety of things. I do not claim it as original, for I took the idea from the pinwheel lace, so will "go snacks" with its author on originality. I have made (by varying the thread) pin-cushion covers, toilet sets, baby carriage covers, plastrons, aprons, laces, and many other articles. The pin-cushion covers may be made to fasten diamond shape or square as preferred, on blue silk. Plastrons are made of 40 or 50 cotton. Very handsome aprons are made of a strip of ribbon

Polka Dot Tatted Medallion.

There is nothing more popular in tatting and crochet work than medallions. Joined together they can be put to a great variety of uses in the way of centrepieces for the dining-table, large and small doilies, applied work for bureau scarfs, buffet and five o'clock table-covers, tidies, pincushion and sofa pillow covers.

When applied to linen as a decoration for corners, ends, etc., the medallions are first basted firmly in place, and are then buttonhole-stitched around the entire outer edge with embroidery cotton. The linen is then cut away underneath, leaving the design, which thus shows to the best advantage.

Autumn Hints on What to Wear and How to Make It.

ARLY fail calls for duck and pique coat suits, which are inexpensive, yet fashionable, and suitable for the season.

Black and white goods still continue to be the most popular.

Bold and daring are the September hats;
many of these hats are frimmed with both fruits and flowers combined; for instance, cherries and the cherry blossoms and any other flowers with their fruits which suit the wearer.

The heavy coarse straw is much used and a popular color in hat decoration is green.

Many of the new autumn skirts are made with yokes, and for cool days dresses are made of cashmere French flannel, or other soft woolen goods.

A serviceable coat is developed in red cloth finished with stitching, for a young girl.
Serge, cheviot and mohair are popular goods.
Light gray homespun makes a smart suit, with a finish of braid.

Answers to Correspondents.

Answers to Correspondents.

Miss Mary B., Trenton, O.—Your pale blue alpaca will add quite an attraction to your wardrobe. Put it in good shape for remodeling, then trim in bands of blue silk, a shade darker; graduate them from the bottom of the skirt to the knee; then begin again with a wide band and graduate to the belt; trim the bodice in the same kind of bands, graduating from the high collar to the belt; trim the sleeve in like manner, and finish the pouch at the waist with a band of silk; a wide sash of the blue silk is worn with this dress. (2) Do over the black taffeta silk; make it over with white, using both black and white lace. (3) A short coat with facings of moire, is as simple a coat as can be made, and yet very much up to date. This coat can be made short or three-quarters length, as preferred, with a coat sleeve or bell-shaped.

Miss Mollie R., Richmond, Va.—You can combine be made short or three-quarters length, as preferred, with a coat sleeve or bell-shaped.

Miss Mollie R., Richmond, Va.—You can combine blue with green, but the blending is, most certainly, to be wisely considered, and the shading also. The parrot green and hyacinth blue can live in harmony, with more real satisfaction than most of the color combinations of the present date. The main color of the gown, however, must be blue, and the green comes in as an accessory. The selecting of the shades and colors and putting them together, requires a very careful and tasteful consideration, or else the gown is an entire failure. If managed rightly the effect is quite pretty. For instance, a blue blouse can be made to be worn with the solid blue skirt. Cut the blouse of taffeta silk, then set in narrow bands of green silk, and cover these bands with an open stitch in blue embroidery silk. This decoration is to be used only on the front and on the sleeves, collar and cuffs. The back of the blouse can be tucked diagonally, straight across, or lengthwise, and buttoned with small green silk buttons. This gown may be worn with a blue straw hat, trimmed with blue and a delicate touch of green; the note of green, if in harmony with the shade of blue, will produce an effect extremely smart and attractive.

Mrs. M. L. Columbus, Ky.—A suitable gown for an elderly person of quiet, tastes can be made.

mony with the shade of blue, will produce an effect extremely smart and attractive.

Mrs. M. L. Columbus, Ky.—A suitable gown for an elderly person of quiet tastes can be made of gun metal gray goods, and an inexpensive one also; make a plain, gored, fiared skirt, above the hem place three wide tucks; and the bodice is made with pin plaits falling from the shoulders half way down the front of the waist with full blouse at the belt. The V shaped neck opens over a collar and front of white silk; finish the bishop sleeve also with pin plaits. Lavender colored silk can be used instead of the white for the collar and front of the bodice, and a piece of lavender silk forms the girdle. This combination makes quite a becoming and also quite a serviceable gown.

Miss Martha N., Ashland, O.—An early fall coat suit of tan colored, light weight cloth will be what you need, the skirt laid in box plaits and stitched with silk of the new currant red in many lines, this stitching forming a narrow point at the lower end where the folds are released to form a graceful fullness above the hem. The coat collar is trimmed with narrow bands of the velvet which are joined together by heavy black lace inserting, and then put on the collar. This is worn with a red silk waist. Red seems to take the lead, especially the fruit reds, in many of the fall costumes as well as in hats. Bright red pipings are also used upon gowns in plain colors. Hats of red straw garnished with black velvet ribbon are a most becoming and fashionable head wear. Small cappes are also being made to wear with early fall gowns.

Miss D., Briceville, Tenn.—The ceru veiling is always advisable, no matter what the design may made to wear with early fall gowns.

Miss D., Briceville, Tenn.—The ecru veiling is always advisable, no matter what the design may be: a little alteration will change it from a summer to an evening gown for winter. It can be trimmed with guipure lace, pointed yoke effect, and long sleeves of lace, tight from the wrist to the elbow, tucking the top of the sleeve of veiling half way down, to fall in a pouch at the elbow. The flounce on the skirt may be headed by inserting put on in deep pointed design.

Mrs B. K. Oneida, S. D.—Your old time flowered.

Mrs. B. K., Oneida, S. D.—Your old time flowered ailk dress is lovely, and will make an "up to date" gown of exquisite development. You certainly should be congratulated on its possession. Flowered materials both in silk and all the gauzy goods are the novelties of the present season.

goods are the novelties of the present season.

Mrs. M. J., Pendleton, S. C.—How can I make a morning dress of linen of any color? Quite a comfortable and very stylish design is blouse effect, cut it surplice, and fasten with loops of heavy cord, and pearl buttons. This can be worn with or without a shield. With the skirt of linen you have a serviceable and most durable costume.

Mrs. Kate S., Howard, R. I.—For early autumn wear, the black taffeta silk can be worn with a white mohair waist embroidered in blue or stitching done in red, or in pale green which is the shade so much in demand. A sash of satin Liberty ribbon would give this costume an extremely smart and graceful finishing touch.

Mrs. N. W. Beaumont. Ps.—An evening gown.

Mrs. N. W., Beaumont, Pa.—An evening gown, of any the thin, gauzy goods so much in vogue, would be quite pretty for a lady of forty, made of black satin striped gauze over white; mingle a bit of turquoise blue trimming, in sweet and simple harmony of design, and you certainly will enjoy the wearing. Have it made in any of the pretty new styles to suit the figure of the wearer.

sleeve, and substitute the bisnop or any long desirable one.

Mrs. W. Apex, N. C.—Yes, anything in white is what you should wear; it adds size and comfort also. Wear your skirts long and very plain in style if you wish to look taller. (2) Short jackets would suit you. (3) Dark colors for the street and all those of more brilliant hue for the evening gowns.

Mrs. Edith L., Garfield, N. M.—I would advise the crepon renovated and retrimmed; crepon is holding its own admirably while the newer ones are somewhat softer than those of other days, yet all are worn. Your crepon dress can be altered nicely; cut it over by a late pattern using new linings, and trim the skirt with taffeta silk, with one or two flounces. Use the silk on the bodice in any pretty way suitable to the wearer; a bit of ecru lace or inserting will freshen up the waist.

Mrs. B., Beverly, N. J.—Your coat should not be tight fitting in the front, but tight in the back; stout women should avoid too much trimming of any kind; never wear horizontal lines. Any tight clinging garment will be becoming.

Mrs. S., Caudia, N. H.—Your very wide black silk with read wear horizontal wear wear.

clinging garment will be becoming.

Mrs. S., Candia, N. H.—Your very wide black silk skirt will produce an attractive and most charming result from your patience, skill and labor. Rip and wipe well with alcohol; press carefully on the wrong side over something black to prevent linting. Cut by one of the new, pretty, clinging skirt patterns and trim with bias folds to simulate tucks; head each fold from the bottom of the skirt running to the belt with narrow gimp. The waist can be made of black mouselline or dotted Swiss; this is tucked in three deep tucks across the waist below the armholes the width of the fold on the skirt; each tuck headed with the gimp. The same tucking is arranged at the lower part of the bishop sleeve.

Miss Blanche R., Hartwell, Mo.—Yes, the foulard

Miss Blanche R., Hartwell, Mo.—Yes, the foulard can be lengthened by using a ruffle of black net; as it is black with a lavender flower design you can trim the ruffle in five or seven rows of lavender satin ribbon, also decorate the bodice in like manner.

Mand. Newberry, Mich.—I would suggest for early fall a dress of light weight serge trimmed in bands of silk Scotch plaid. As it is to be worn by a young Miss, it could be made gored skirt trimmed with six bands of plaid. The waist may be cut in any becoming style, and trimmed with the bands, box plait, back and front. Place the narrow silk band between the plaits, all the way to the belt, a yoke effect. The sleeves are still holding the effect of early summer, "bagging" below the elbow. These may be box-plaited across the top and gathered into a cuff, trimmed with bands of the silk.

Miss K., Alvin, Ill.—Yes, French knots will trim a fiannel blouse very prettlly. Use any design. If the fiannel is blue, then use shaded blue silk for the knots, and an outlining through them of black. If the blouse is of brown fiannel, use orange-colored silk for the knots, and a dash of white outlining. Do not make any of these decorations elaborate for a blouse.

Mrs. L. L., Winona, Miss.—Make the lawn skirt elaborate for a blouse.

Mrs. L. L., Winona, Miss.—Make the lawn skirt tucked diagonally; this adds to the smartness of the gown very greatly. It will take more goods, but after all, it will consume more time than money. You will have a dainty skirt in this way. Add a tucked flounce, and trim the walst in the same manner. Any simple lace, or insertion, can be used. Lace seems to be the favorite finish for all garments.

Miss Martha V. Advence Year and the same manner.

Miss Martha V., Advance, Ind.—The colored autumn linens for waists should not be stamped. For the cross stitch, baste on scrim, and work over it, for the cross stitch, as in days of yore. When the stitching is finished, cut out the scrim.

Mrs. Dora H., Cambridge, Idaho.—No shade or color overrules the immense popularity of white. It will be worn as the cooler weather approaches on into midwinter in all sorts of heavier goods. (2) For a blouse, coarse white basket cloth in cotton would be suitable, ornamented with French knots.

Mrs. Nora W., Shelbyville, Ky.—The baby's cloak could be made of cashmere or any soft wool material in the most simple and babylike design. Line it with India silk or any soft inexpensive lining and do not make it longer than two or three inches below the skirt. The cloak for baby must be warm but not heavy.

Miss Susan R. Biohymond, Vs.—"Liberty, Brile.

be warm but not heavy.

Miss Susan R., Richmond, Va.—"Liberty Brilliant" is a name given to a soft clinging all silk goods, it drapes gracefully and has a satin finish. It is seen in street gowns as well as evening wear.

Miss Gertrude L., East River, Tenn.—Everything is ruffling, flouncing and blousing; "simplicity" sits in sackcloth and ashes. (2) Yes, make every garment in the most "trimmed up" style. After all the lavish use of many different kinds of transparent fabric all the summer season, we hear a distant rustle in the close approaching autumn air which fortetls of accessories yet unheard of for the finishing touches of the more weighty material, which are so soon to take the place of the summer novelties. summer novelties.

A Turtle Tape Measure.

Can you imagine anything more useful than a tape measure for a thousand and one purposes connected with your sewing, crocheting, knit-ting or fancy work? Think of the satisfaction of having every measurement agree and the whole of each piece of work complete and perfect. Ordinary tape measures are more of inconvenience than an assistance because you have to be careful and not get them into a snarl.

Now this little Sterling Silver Green Turtle

we picture here contains a thirty-six inch linen measure that is wound by a strong spring so that when not in use it coils up inside ready to be pulled out again without thought or trouble. In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one month.

HE summer is over, my dears, and the autumn is coming with its harvests of the year, and may it bring to you some of the good things that the deserving do not always fail to get. September is a pleasant month, and may you all enjoy it. Now let us to work.

The first to come with her questions is Cousin Daffodil of Montrose, Iowa, and she wants to know if a girl likes a man and he doesn't know it what should she do to let him find out? Dear me, oh, dear me. If he is so stupid as not to find out for himself, for goodness sake, Daffodil, don't do anything to let him know. How can you like such a stupid person?

Seline, St. Sylvester, P. Q.—Girls and boys of sixteen and eighteen have no business being engaged.

M. B., Montrose, Ia.—The only way to treat a strange man who attempts to force his attentions upon you is to ask some decent man, policeman or otherwise, to take him in hand and rid you of him. "Mashers," as they are called, ought to be tarred and feathered and driven to the woods.

Belva, Alton, Pa.—It is not improper to place flowers on the desk of the Professor you like, but it is not commendable. Don't do it.

B. and T., Tecumseh, Neb.—The only way to secure beaus is to make yourselves attractive in a sweet, womanly way. Nice men like that better than anything. Mrs. D. C. L. Independence, Mo.—It is the custom in the larger cities for ladies to reserve one day in the week when they are at home to callers and callers are expected on that day. If they call at other times they may be received or not as the lady chooses, and they should not criticise her for not being at home on "off days". Ladies should adopt this rule in the smaller towns, where a great deal of valuable time is wasted by indiscriminate callers who "run in" at any hour and don't seem to know when to run out. Of course in the large cities this kind of informal visiting is not possible.

Such receptions or teas, would be informal, would cost little or nothing for refreshments as the simplest things would be served, people could drop in and out again, even the men could come in for a few minutes, and the whole social life of the place would be encouraged and improved. We heartily recommend your trying it and would advise the ladies of other small towns to do the same. It would not be necessary to send out invitations. All your sequaintances would be welcome, and they could

In a store, while he might remove his hat when he spoke to the lady and keep it off while talking briefly to her, he would put it on again if they remained in company and went about the store together. I lived only with a hope of some day having revenge, and that hope has at last been realized. Here lies the man who has caused me all my woe. And it is no wonder that my own son did not know me, so greatly have I been changed by suffering."

The youth now recognized his father in that mis-shapen cripple, and throwing himself upon his neck, wept:

"Father, father! found at last!"

CHAPTER XX. CONCLUSION.

CHAPTER XX.

CONCLUSION.

After the excitement attending the discovery had somewhat subsided, the sergeant made a short inventory of their losses. They had one man killed, another wounded, while four of the road agents were lying stiff and lifeless upon the ground, their chief one of the number, and they had good reason to believe that two or three of those who had escaped did not get away unscathed. It was a decided victory.

We will state here for the benefit of the reader, that the band of Captain Snell has never been heard of since that night. Those who escaped doubtless were too much afraid of the power of the law, which was capable of reaching out even into the wilderness to protect people, to again openly defy it.

Mr. Holland told his son that his money was buried in a large cavern, which he had accidentally found. He thought that it was in an easterly direction from the hut. Daylight dawned, and they were about to bury the dead robbers before going in search of the cavern of death, which both Archie and Ned Todd knew must be the cavern alluded to, when they were suddenly startled by a wild cry, and Oklahoma Peg suddenly burst from the wood, and running to the side of the road agent chieftain, fell upon her knees and burst into the most frantic fit of weeping.

"Oh, he is dead, he whom I loved, but who was losing his love for me," she cried. Wilder and wilder grew her sobs and cries, until she, in a fit of frenzy, snatched a small silver handled dagger, which she wore in the belt about her waist, and before any one could interfere to prevent her, plunged it to her heart.

Side by side, the road agent and his injured bride were huried. Then the others were not the bride were huried. Then the others were not the bride were huried. Then the others were not the bride were huried. Then the others were not the bride were huried. Then the others were not the bride were huried. neart.

Side by side, the road agent and his injured bride were buried. Then the others were put beneath the sod, and with only a few relics the party set out to find the cavern of death.

Ned Todd's skill and judgment in wood craft again stood them in need. Had it not been for him it is doubtful if they could have been death.

for him, it is doubtful if they could have found for him, it is doubtful if they could have found it.

Archie Holland rode by the side of his crippled fatner, and the latter told him all about his horrib. captivity, and how he had prayed for liberty. In that the vengeance of the Lord might fall aponthe men who had inflicted such a fearful punishment upon him.

The cavern was reached, and they all entered. Mr. Holland recognized the place. He said that it had evidently been inhabited two hundred years before by some of the old Spanish explorers under De Soto, as he had found a full suit of armor, and two or three old matchlocks of the period.

The gold was buried under the approach to the natural bridge and it proved to be under the very stone which Archie Holland had knocked over into the torrent below, when he saved the life of the detective by catching him. But for some dust and debris that had settled upon the great iron chest in which the gold upon the great iron chest in which the gold was kept, it would have been discovered when the loose stone was rolled off from it.
"Here it is, and all right," said the father.
"Now let us reach the settlement as soon as possible, and then we will live happily, my son."

When they returned to the boomers' camp, they found Daisy much improved, and the whole party one week later was ready to start

They reached the city of Abeline, where the

They reached the city of Abeline, where the youth and his father were to take the train for their eastern home. Before parting from the boomers, Mr. Holland made each of them a present in gold, which to a considerable extent compensated them for their loss in Oklahoma.

Daisy had no relatives left, and Archie Holland had grown to love the poor friendless girl. When she had regained her health, he proposed marriage and was accepted. His father approved the union, and saw no reason of delaying the marriage. After considerable persuasion, the bashful, modest Daisy consented to become his wife at once, and the next day they were married in the little white church, which stands just in the outskirts of Abeline.

A few days later they took their departure. First, before going, Archie paid the sum agreed upon to Major Todd, the border scout and detective, for his very faithful and effective services rendered in the search for his father.

Then with his young wife he went to his old home, where he engaged in a prosperous mercantile business. His crippled father is an inmate of his household, and is pitted by all who know of his great misfortune and suffering. There is no more prosperous and honorable business man in the city where he lives, than Archibald Holland.

E. S. West, Stafford, Conn.—Our advice is not to try fox raising in Alaska unless you have unlimited capital. If you have money you can employ men to live on a fox island, but if you tried it yourself you would soon wish you were back in Connecticut. The climate is cold and damp, especially on the island, and you would be about as lonely as Robinson Crusoe was. The fox raising in Alaska is done either by natives, or companies with capital who employ natives to do the work. Emma Wigglesworth, Altavista, Mo.—We know of no Ozark Mountain circulars. Mrs. Lawra Powell, Pollak, Texas—We are not landscape gardeners in this department and would not like to offer advice at this distance. In our opinion, however, you are as good a judge where to place your trees and shrubs as a professional would be, and better than any book could tell you. Set them out to suit your own taste and you will be better satisfied than if you had some one else to do it for you by rules of gardening that you did not understand. The chief point to be observed in setting out shade trees is to locate them where they will furnish shade where it is most needed during the hottest hours of the day. Comfort is of more value in this regard than rules of Art.

Mrs. Mary Robinson, Widdowfield. Wyo.—Write to Commissioner of Public Lands, Washington, D. C. and to Hon. J. H. Vaughn, Territorial Treasurer, Santa Fe, N. M., for information concerning desert lands. New Mexico has over fifty-five million acres of public lands subject to entry and settlement, over fourteen millions of which are not yet surveyed.

M. D., Niangua, Mo.—We do not know the school laws of Arkansas, but you can get all information by writing to State Superintendent of Schools, Little Rock. There is something over three millions of acres of public lands in Arkansas, most of which we fancy is hardly tillable. Write to Land Commissioner, Washington, D. C., or to Hon. Frank Hill, Commissioner of Agriculture, Little Rock, Ark. We fancy you would find as many teachers in Arkansas as you do in Missouri. If you are determined to teach why not write to the War Department at Washington, D. C., or to Hon. Frank Hill, commissioner, washington and find out about schools in the Philippines?

Old Man, East Kingston, N. H.—We do not know positively, but we believe there is no part of the country where stomach troubles may be benefited by climatic conditions. In some localities where th Landlord, Emporia, Kan.—There is a letter at this office which will be forwarded if your address is furnished.

Mrs. Allie West, Corning, N. Y.—Lumbering has never been actively pushed in South Carolina and it would be hard to say what are lumbering towns. About 68 per cent. of the state is believed to be covered with merchantable timber, and no doubt an active man from the north might do well there. Write to Hon. M. R. Cooper, Columbia, for information, asking him to refer your letter to some one in the lumber business who is reliable. Georgia contains three times as much standing timber as South Carolina, and within the last ten years the business has largely increased. We have no details or figures, but if you will write to Hon. O. B. Stevens, Commissioner of Agriculture, Atlanta, asking him to refer your letter to some reliable dealer, you will be put in the way of finding out all you want to know before going there to see for yourself.

Farmer, Altoona, Okla.—If you can get $200 a year, even in grain, for a farm costing $2,000 you are doing much better than you could in anything in our knowledge. Land anywhere east of the Mississippi that will produce twenty bushels of wheat to the acre is worth from $50 an acre up, and you can easily calculate what kind of an income you would get from a $2,000 farm. There are some towns where you could buy small houses for renting, that might bring you in gross $250 to $300 a year, but they are extremely hard to find and rents would likely go down with the erection of a very few extra houses. $300 a year, which you seem to think you can get on your $2,000 to invest, means 15 per cent. and money is hardly worth that these days when three per cent. government bonds are selling at a premium. You will either have to come down in your notions or find something that every one in this country with money would only be too glad to get hold of. Why not go to Washington or Oregon and loan your money on mort-gages? You can g would not, however, advise Florida as a place for the livery business unless you have special advantages. Write to the Editor of the Sub Tropic, Palatka, and ask him what he thinks of it. In any event you would have to investigate the field personally.

F. D. C., Medina, Ohio.—Mt. Vernon, N. Y. is a very pleasant suburban town about half an hour from New York City, and is a desirable place of the control of residence, though rents are high, a very ordinary house bringing from $25 to $50 a month.

Miss K. I. J., Madison, Wis.—A boarding house in Seattle would probably pay if you were skillful in keeping it, and had good business sense. Prices are not high there, six to ten dollars a week, for one person in a room, according to house and style, and higher than ten in some instances. Provisions are higher than in western markets, but not very much. Help is the largest item of expense, cooks being worth from $30 to $50 a month, and house girls $20. Rent is also high in good neighborhoods. Fuel is the least expense, as the winters are never cold, and little fire goes a long way, though in some years some fire is necessary every month in the year for a day or two at a time.

M. I. K., Doyleston, Pa.—Real estate almost any-the year for a day or two at a time.

M. I. K., Doyleston, Pa.—Real estate almost anywhere along the Maine coast is high in price, as compared with rough land elsewhere. The entire section has become very popular as a resort for summer people from the cities east of the Mississippi, and they are people with money who are willing to pay for what they want. There are many desirable places, however, where you could get very good value for your $5,000. Pretty much the same condition exists along the south shore of Connecticut, where prices are even higher in favored localities. You get more mosquitoes though for your money in Connecticut than you do in Maine.

Marvelous Elixir of Life Discovered by Famous Doctor-Scientist That Cures Every Known Ailment.

Wonderful Cures are Effected That Seem Like Miracles Performed--The Secret of Long Life of Olden Times Revived.

The Remedy Is Free to All Who Send Name and Address.

After years of patient study, and delving into the dusty record of the past, as well as following modern experiments in the realms of medical science, Dr. James W. Kidd, 213 Baltes Block, Fort Wayne, Ind., makes the startling announcement that he has surely discovered the elixir of life. That he is able with the aid of a mysterious compound, known only to himself, produced as a result of the years he has spent in searching for this precious life-giving boon, to cure any and every disease that is known to the human body. There is no doubt of the doctor's earnestness in making his claim and the remarkable cures that he is daily effecting seems to bear him out very strongly. His theory which he advances is one of reason and based on sound experience in a medical practice of many years. It costs nothing to try his remarkable "Elixir of Life," as he calls it, for he sends it free, to anyone who is a sufferer, in sufficient quantities to convince of its ability to cure, so there is absolutely no risk to run. Some of the cures cited are very remarkable, and but for reliable witnesses would hardly be credited. The lame have thrown away crutches and walked about after two or three trials of the remedy. The sick, given up by home doctors, have been restored to their families and friends in perfect health. Rheumatism, neuralgia, stomach, heart, liver, kidney, blood and skin diseases and bladder troubles disappear as by magic. Headaches, backaches, nervousness, fevers, consumption, coughs, colds, asthma, catarrh, bronchitis and all affections of the throat, lungs or any vital organs are easily overcome in a space of time that is simply marvelous.

Partial paralysis, locomotor ataxia, dropsy, gout, scrofula and piles are quickly and permanently removed. It purifies the entire system, blood and tissues, restores normal nerve power, circulation and a state of perfect health is produced at once. To the doctor all systems are alike and equally affected by this great "Elixir of Life." Send for the remedy to-day. It is free to every sufferer. State what you want to be cured of and the sure remedy for it will be sent you free by return mail.

Family Doctor.

O many inquiries are received by COMFORT concerning the health of the family that a column will be devoted to answering them. The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be referred to physicians, not to us. Address The Family Doctor, Comfort, Augusta, Maina.

Clerk, Pittsburg, Texas.—In reducing your flesh stop eating all fattening foods, that is those with starch or sweetening in them, as cereals, peas, beans, corn, potatoes and such. Have your bread toasted and put salt on it instead of butter. Drink no milk, and just as little water as you can possibly get along with, and make that acid with the juice of lemons or limes. Sleep only seven hours at night, and during the day when you feel like taking a nap, take exercise instead. And take plenty of exercise, five miles for a walk is none too much. Lately it has been announced that a diet of beef and spinach, disregarding all the other foods, will reduce the flesh more quickly and with less danger than any other course. You must in a manner starve yourself or you will continue to gather flesh.

Mrs. D., Bellows Falls, Vt.—We are afraid that gather flesh.

Mrs. D., Bellows Falls, Vt.—We are afraid that we can do very little toward relieving your asthma. If it is possible for you to make a trip to Denver, or to New Mexico, it would do more good than all the medicines the doctors could give. Of the simpler remedies patients have found relief in inhaling tobacco smoke and some by wearing a gauze veil over the face. Have you ever tried a mixture of honey and castor oil? Two ounces of the best of honey and one ounce of castor oil are the proportions. Take a teaspoonful night and morning. Try some of the patent medicines that are to be had at the drug stores. Very many times they can do what the doctors fail in.

I. H., Greenwich, Kans.—The best thing for

I. H., Greenwich, Kans.—The best thing for blackheads and red blotches on the face is to get your blood in better condition, which may be done by eating very simple food with the smallest amount of grease, frequent bathing in hot water, and plenty of exercise in the open air. For local applications to the blackheads use, after squeezing them out, a mixture of pure brandy two ounces, cologne, one ounce, liquor of potassa, one half ounce. Apply at night after washing the face thoroughly with soap and water. As to the red blotches, we cannot venture a local application because we do not know what causes them. You had better consult your home physician.

had better consult your home physician.

A Wyoming correspondent writes to say that common table salt is a sure cure for hay fever, or at least was in her case and that of a friend of hers. Her experience with it extended over three years, and each year it prevented the disease. She took half a teaspoonful every morning. She does not say how she administered it, but we suppose she snuffed it. The same correspondent says that willow charcoal tablets are almost a specific in cases of headache arising from disordered stomach. We thank the lady, and hope other correspondents with good, simple remedies will submit them.

A. E. L., Covelo, Cal.—There are numerous reme-with good, simple remedies will submit them.

A. E. L., Covelo, Cal.—There are numerous remedies for falling hair. A famous lotion that will prevent its falling out is made of cologne, two ounces; tincture of cantharides, two drachms; oil of lavender or rosemary, ten drops. Apply morning and night for a time, then at less frequent intervals. If the scalp becomes sore, use less frequently. (2) There is no absolutely harmless hair dye, because any of them makes the hair unnatural. Any dye that your druggist will recommend is as good as any we can give you a recipe for. (3) Write to A. Simonson, 933 Broadway, New York City. (4) There is no sure cure for catarrh. Some patent medicines are a relief and it is sometimes practically cured by going to some parts of the country, Colorado, New Mexico or Arizona, where the air is perfectly dry.

E. C., West Lake, Minn.—We are afraid we can Colorado, New Mexico or Arizona, where the air is perfectly dry.

E. C., West Lake, Minn.—We are afraid we can not do much for your yellow neck. An excellent wash that may be of some benefit is made of pure oxide of zinc, one ounce; glycerine, one ounce; rosewater, four ounces; essence of rose, fifteen drops. Sift the zinc, dissolving it in just enough of the rosewater to cover it; add the glycerine, and then the rest of the rosewater. Shake well and apply with a soft sponge or antiseptic gauze. The neck must be well wiped off before the liquid dries, or it will be streaked. This does not remove the yellow, it merely hides it. (2) Vaseline thoroughly rubbed into the scalp, but not on all the hair, will make it less dry and sooth the scalp. Use it at intervals of three weeks or a month. (3) If you will take a cold bath every morning, you will be much less liable to take cold. At least soak your feet in cold water every morning, and rub them dry with a rough towel. Wear cotton stockings and loose shoes.

Argus, Evansville, Ind.—Granulated eyelids are dry with a rough towel. Wear cotton stockings and loose shoes.

Argus, Evansville, Ind.—Granulated eyelids are not to be treated by newspaper remedies, but require the care of an occulist who is thoroughly competent. If the case is merely a slight trouble, a very good remedy, that can do no harm if it does no good, is made of alum powder eight drams, and white of one egg. Shake together until they coagulate. Apply on linen and cover with muslin.

Frank K., Leonardtown, Md.—People do not inherit disease; they inherit only the predisposition. If there is consumption in your family, the wisest thing for you to do is to live in some part of the country where consumption is practically unknown. The high parts of Colorado, the warm, dry plains of Arizona and New Mexico, should be chosen as your home. There with ordinary care of yourself you will live out your three score and ten, as far as consumption is concerned.

Kitty, Jackson, Ark.—Tartar on the teeth is the result of too much acid in the system. It may be removed by taking a sharpened pine stick and dipping it into pulverized pumice stone moistened with lemon juice and rubbing the parts of the teeth affected. Rinse the mouth with warm water. Do not use the pumice stone except when necessary, as it will injure the enamel. Brush your teeth twice a day, using soft water and a brush not too stiff.

Miss Pansy, Wilmington, Del.—If your general health is good your pallor, or lack of color is due wice a day, using soft water and a brush not too stiff.

Miss Pansy, Wilmington, Del.—If your general health is good your pallor, or lack of color is due largely to lack of oxygen in the blood, and you should stay in the open air as much as possible, and sleep in a room where you can get fresh air all night. During the day get out and take long and frequent breaths of good air. This will get the oxygen into your lungs from where it will go into the blood and supply the deficiency which seems to be lacking. If your general health is not good, your case demands the attention of a physician who can study the conditions and make the proper suggestions for a remedy. Some people are naturally pallid, in which case there is no remedy.

A. Z., Palmyra, Va.—Judging off hand we should say that you have indigestion with its train of discomforts. Suppose you try a diet of plain food, and not very much of it, taking about half a teaspoonful of ordinary cooking sods in a glass of water after each meal. About once a week take a tablespoonful of Glauber salts in a glass of hot water before breakfast. And take plenty of exercise, unless your work is active and in the open air.

H. R. S., San Francisco, Cal.—If you have a formula for curing inflammatory(not "inflamable," as you have it) rheumatism in two days you can get all the money you want for it. We would advise your getting it patented at once.

O. S., Gladden, Mo.—We have supposed you have consulted physicians, if not you should do so. For yourself what might be of great benefit to your difficult breathing would be frequent long inhalations of fresh air. Stand up out of doors and practice long breaths, beginning gently at first. Do it as you progress for five minutes at a time, and any number of times during the day. Evidently you have catarrh but you should find out from a physician whether you have or not. Such a condition as you describe yourself to be in requires much more careful treatment than you could get through a newspaper.

K. M. B., Hagerstown, Md.—Your dizziness head-a newspaper.

K. M. B., Hagerstown, Md.—Your dizziness, headache, mental depression, etc. are due very evidently to over-eating. You cannot over-load your stomach and expect to keep in a good condition. Don't diet yourself, but actually stop eating. That is, skip a meal every other day for a week, and then skip two for a day or two at a time, until your stomach has a chance to gain its normal strength. You will either have to do this or quit eating altogether, and you know what that means. Don't take any more medicine.

Mrs. M. H. O'D, Knightstown, Ind.—An arcellant

Mrs. M. H. O'D, Knightstown, Ind.—An excellent remedy for the stings or bites of spiders, wasps or bees, is to apply equal parts of common salt and bicarbonate of soda dissolved in warm water, well rubbed in. This will ordinarily give instant relief. Another remedy is one part spirit of hartshorn and two parts olive oil, rubbed in.

Mother, Emporia, Kans.—If you find difficulty in having your children take castor oil, beat it up with the white of an egg until both are thoroughly mixed. You may add a little sugar if you wish, and the children will not object to it, if you do not tell them you are giving them castor oil.

Miss R., Springfield, Vt.—Bad breath may be remedied by taking a teaspoonful of the following mixture after each meal: one ounce liquor of potassa, one ounce chloride of soda, one ounce phose phate of soda, and three ounces of water. If it is the result of bad teeth they must be looked after by a dentist.

the result of bad teeth they must be looked after by a dentist.

K. L. Y., Spokane, Wash.—If your patient is troubled with bed sores apply to them the white of an egg well beaten and mixed with spirits of wine. Another remedy is to bathe them in a mixture of powdered alum and whiskey, one tablespoonful of alum to a teacupful of whiskey.

Hiram H., Rockport, Ind.—You may cure your ingrowing nails by careful treatment and well selected shoes. That is shoes which do not press down on the foot. Get from the druggist some perchloride of iron in fluid form and apply a small quantity to the painful part. Almost immediate relief will be experienced, and presently the skin will begin to dry and harden, and the pain will gradually depart. Let the hardened flesh remain for two weeks or more when it may be removed by soaking the feet in warm water. New and healthy flesh will be found below, and if the nails be cut only at the top and curved, with possibly a groove cut down the top of them, the ingrowing will be prevented and no more trouble will be had with them. In less serious cases simply scraping the top of the nail with a piece of glass until it is quite thin will prevent growing into the flesh at the side.

Do not be alarmed about your ears until you have tried to restore their faculty, which you say quite thin will prevent growing into the flesh at the side.

Do not be alarmed about your ears until you have tried to restore their faculty, which you say seems to be impaired without any reason for it. Inject some tepid water into the ear with that side of the head held upward. Then let the water run out after a minute. Drop in a couple of drops daily of this mixture: ten drops sassafras oil; one fluid drachm of glycerine; half fluid ounce olive oil. A simple cure for earache is to put a wad of cotton in the bowl of a tobacco pipe, saturate it with chloroform, place another dry wad over it, place the stem in the ear and blow through the bowl. The fumes of the chloroform enter and effect an almost immediate cure.

Kate K., Pulaski, Tenn.—Your palpitation of the heart is not true heart disease, and you are in no danger from it if you will be careful to eat only digestible food. You have indigestion and not angina pectoris and a drink of bicarbonate of soda in a glass of hot water after meals will be found to be a remedy. Prevention is better than cure in such cases, and you must diet yourself and take more exercise. Indigestion sometimes kills, and it sometimes makes one feel so bad that he wishes it would be quicker in its fatality.

E. W. C., Parish, Ills.—If your physician cannot stop the running of your ear we will not undertake the case. A very little mistake may cause you the loss of your hearing, and we advise you to take advice of a physician, or at least of a druggist w may recommend something that can do no harn

Y. T., Corryton, Tenn.—The use of depilatories, or hair removers, is not recommended, although some of them are practically harmless. Boudet's depilatory is said to be very effective and safe. It is made of three parts hydro-sulphurst of sodium (crystallized); ten parts finely powdered quick-lime and eleven parts starch. It should not be applied longer than from two to four minutes and washed off. Another is made of a strong solution of sulphurst of barium mixed to a paste with starch, finely powdered. Apply immediately after mixing and remove after five or ten minutes, according to the growth of hair.

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR OCTOBER, 1902.

October 1 - Wednesday. This month opens with a superior day which should be improved to its fullest extent in forwarding all the major enterprises of life. REGULUS advises his friends to initiate their great undertakings; buy goods for trade; open new phaces for business; deal with judges, counsellors, ecclesiastics, and traders in wool and woolen goods; use the day for financial negotiations and gaining business credit and reputation. In general, all parents born about the 29th of January, 29th of March or May or the 1st of October or last of November, of past years, have now improved prosperity and better condition of health.

prosperity and better condition of health.

2—Thursday. Improve every moment of the forenoon for dealings in metals, machinery and entiry, also for the pursuit of the mechanical trades and inventions; perform experiments in chemistry, study new methods in all mechanical and electrical work; deal with public officials and manufacturing corporations or railways; as the afternoon advances more baffling conditions prevail and disappointments and disagreeable experiences are induced; have no dealings with real estate men nor trade in agricultural implements or products.

3—Friday. Urge all commercial transactions during this day; prosecute mathematical and scientific studies; deal with the intellectual classes, booksellers, publishers, printers, lawyers, press-writers and attend to matters of account. In the atternoon do not expect success in money negotiations nor be careless or extravagant in handling or dispensing thy wordly goods.

A—Saturday. Give preference to the forenoon for thy most important moves, particularly if same are concerned with literary labors of any class of mental work; the latter half of the day induces quarrels and disagreements and suggests patience and self-control; do not have any surgical operations performed on this day and be very careful in handling sharp instruments, fire-arms, explosives, and inflammable materials; heart troubles are aggravated at this time.

are aggravated at this time.

5—Sunday. The mind will be inclined towards the elegant in literature and the imagination will be active; pulpit efforts will abound in flower of speech and be effective in religious matters.

6—Monday. Begin the day early and give thy best energies to business; buy goods for trade and deal with judges, ecclesiastics, and persons of means and prominence; seek money accommodations, make collections, adjust accounts, prosecute mathematical studies; do important correspondence, travel, and make all kinds of contracts; commercial men are especially favored.

7—Tuesday. Push general business vigorously during this day, giving extra efforts to such business as pertains to manufacture or construction; travel, trade in cattle, and deal with chemists, physicians, military men and all who work with fire, machinery or sharp tools.

in cattle, and deal with chemists, physicians, military men and all who work with fire, machinery or sharp tools.

S-Wednesday. Baffling circumstances attend the prosecution of business relating to fancy and ornamental goods, musical merchandise and also the pursuits of the fine arts; make no matrimonial engagement in the forenoon, nor expect much progress in such undertakings already in hand; the afternoon is quite favorable for all classes of literary work-particularly prose and not poetry; do commercial correspondence and contract making.

9-Thursday. Give no cause for offence to thine employer or superior in office; the day is quite a treacherous one; sign no deeds nor transact business pertaining to houses or lands or any kind of mining enterprises; not make purchases of any of the agricultural productions—lumber, wool, coal, petroleum, lead, or copper.

10-Friday. This day is generally propitious for urging all the honorable pursuits without special encouragement to any particular class of engagements.

11-Saturday. Though the last day of the week, let none of the moments of the day be wasted but pursue thine avocations vigorously for thine exertions for pecuniary advantages in all honorable undertakings will meet with more than ordinary success; buy goods for trade, especially of an elegant, artistic or decorative nature; seek money accommodations; ask for credit; open new stores; deal with banks and other monied institutions; make collections; attend to architectural work; buy clothing and decorative apparel and urge the fine arts.

12-Saunday. A favorable Sabbath day; peculiar and original religious ideas and doctrines engage the mind and pulpit discourse will be striking rather than commonplace.

for literary matters and for the prosecution of the mathe-matical and scientific studies; let all classes of contracts affecting legal matters and all important movements for intellectual improvement and educational interests be now made. Merchants and tradesmen are particularly favored. The afternoon is less to be depended upon, be-ing peculiarly unfortunate for any kind of real estate transactions.

14-Tuesday. Do not use this time for any transaction pertaining to patents, trademarks, copyrights, or any business connected with corporations, nor deal in any article depending for its value upon protected rights of investors; use the afternoon for engagements with builders, contractors, miners, farmers and dealers in produce.

15-Wednesday. Employ this day for forwarding all the general affairs of life, though do not use the time for inaugurating any new or very important enterprises, as conditions do not promise well for successful results.

16—Thursday. It will be better to defer important engagements relating to the elegant pursuits and fine arts until after the noon hour, but let affairs pertaining to scientific or political matters be urged vigorously during the middle hours of the day when also deal with officials and employees of railways, steamships and corporations; have no dealings with very aged persons in the evening nor expect any favor from persons in authority.

17—Friday. Total Eclipse of the Moon just after midnight, visible in the United States. Use the early forencon for pressing engagements with persons in the manufacturing and mechanical enterprises and for dealings with engineers, surgeons, electricians, military men, cutlers, and iron and brass workers; the latter hours of the forencon are unfavorable for successful mental labor or dealings pertaining to books, writings, contracts or agreements of any kind; nor should any application be made during the middle hours of the day to public officials for favor or advantage.

18—Saturday. Be watchful of the purse during the first half of this day, nor permit desires for personal gratification to induce an extravagant expenditure of means; do not purchase goods for trade nor be careless in exposing valuables where they could be easily stolen.

19—Sunday. The morning is the best part of the day though the day generally contributes to aggressive and inharmonious discourse and is promotive of excitement and controversy; fires are to be particularly guarded against.

guarded against.

20—Monday. The very early and late hours of the day are the best. Use the morning for urging collections and otherwise attending to money matters; make no written application for any favor during the forenoon, but give thy best efforts to the afternoon especially for any of the elegant pursuits, artistic work, or musical or dramatical affairs; make no matrimonial engagements in the evening.

the evening.

21—Tuesday. This is one of the excellent days of the month and REQULUS urges his friends to fully improve every moment of the time for inaugurating important matters of the passing life. Let special preference be given to such business as pertains to commerce in connection with manufacturing and mechanical enterprises, important literary and scientific work, and mathematical and educational undertakings; have dealings with those engaged in such matters; perform chemical and electrical experiments; have dentistry attended to; consult thy lawyer and begin litigation if it must be resorted to.

22—Wednesday. Let this day be improved for all general affairs and engagements of a minor character and importance, especially to those pertaining to the elegant, artistic, and decorative in life; but steps of much magnitude are best postponed until the 25th instant.

23.—Thursday. An evil day. Fraud and deceit are among the principal characteristics of the passing time; beware of treachery; avoid beginning journeys; sign no deeds of writings nor have any transactions of importance in the law; avoid dealings in real estate and with elderly persons; beware of giving credit in thy business. Persons engaged in the literary pursuits, as a rule, are not prosperous at this time. Persons born about the 14th of January, 15th of April, 20th of July, or 23rd of October, of past years, will need to exercise great circumspection in all their affairs for nearly a year to come; tendencies towards perplexities and troubles in business, pecuniary losses, physical and mental depression, and family misfortunes are some of the accompanying evils peculiar to the near prevailing influences in such lives. Nervous disorders are likely to many of the gentler sex so born.

24—Friday. The mischievous conditions of yesterday reach well into the forenoon of this day and caution is extended for this time. Money losses are to be looked out for during the forenoon, in which no investment of means should be made for profit nor should monied collections or accommodations be sought. The afternoon initiates some of the choicer conditions and should be vigorously employed in forwarding all enterprises of moment. Particular efforts should be given to all manufacturing enterprises, especially in the nature of weaving and constructing the fine classes of goods; consult the tailor, milliner, dressmaker and dentist and purchase mathematical, philosophical and scientific wares.

26—Sünday. The morning is very excitable and patience and moderation are admonished; the balance of the day abounds in benevolence and conduces in a marked degree enjoyment of religious and moral education and intellectual improvement.

27—Monday. The middle hours of the day favor dealings in houses and lands, real estate improvements and house furnishing and letting; the morning and evening are less favorable for any transaction.

28—Tuesday. The noon hours are the poorest of the day, but as the atternoon is entered upon let every energy be given in thy business and labor; urge all honorable pursuits to the utmost; deal with bankers and persons of wealth, judges and lawyers; seek money accommodations; buy goods for trade and adjust accounts.

29—Weduesday. Begin the day early; urge all correspondence and the literary pursuits to the utmost; engage help, travel, and deal with teachers, mathematicians, lawyers and judges; attend to business with public officials and government authorities.

30—Thursday. Improve every moment of this day; giving preference to the fine arts and manufactures; the artist, musician, dramatist, and all engaged in the artistic pursuits should waste no moments of this day in idleness or pleasure, for the passing time promises unusual advantages from works now begun or executed. The day favors courtship and invites the marriage contract.

tract.

31-Friday Partial Eclipse of the Sun. An indifferent day, not to be recommended for beginning any new work or undertaking of consequence; particularly should caution be exercised in all money matters lest losses come; and no promotion or advance from thine employers but confine thine efforts principally to routine matters.

NOTICE TO AGENTS

A Profitable Business

FOR MEN AND WOMEN WHO ARE

WILLING WORK. TO $3.00 A DAY SURE.

DEAR READER:

If you are out of work, or are not satisfied with your present business and would like to make more money, it will be to your interest to read this notice. We do not offer you a chance to make a fortune without work, but we do offer you an opportunity to make money much faster than you can make it at any other kind of work. The country is flooded with circulars offering chances to make money at the rate of from twenty to fifty dollars a day; such offers are not business-like, and all agents who amount to anything are disgusted with such circulars, and most of them are thrown aside without being read. If you are looking for an opportunity to make twenty to fifty dollars a day, you might as well throw this notice aside also; but if you would like to engage in a good paying business, you will do well to read this notice through carefully. Then you can use your own judgment as to whether our offer is a reasonable one or not.

We guarantee that anyone who is willing to work can make from $3 to $5 a day at this business. We admit that $3 to $5 a day is not much of an inducement when compared to the statements made by some firms, who offer all the way from $20 to $50 a day for selling various articles. We do not make you such glowing promises, but what we do offer you has the advantage of being true. We might offer agents a sure chance of making from $20 to $50 a day, but the chances are that anyone who would believe such unreasonable nonsense would not know enough to earn his board at any kind of business. That is not the kind of agents we are in quest of; we want reliable agents with common sense, who are willing to work for good pay, and not those who are looking for an opportunity to make a fortune without work. We believe the only way to get such agents and keep them, is to furnish them with a good thing to sell, a real genuine bargain, and then to tell them the exact truth about the business. We have a large number of agents at work, and the business. We have a large number of agents at work, and we know for a certainty what working agents can make. We know that $3 a day is the very lowest; most of our agents are averaging $4 and $5 a day, and often some of them make a good deal more than that. We have several agents who are clearing from $7 to $10 a day. But these are great workers operating in the best territory, and, of course, everyone cannot do as well, but it is easy for anyone to make, at the very least, $3 a day above all expenses an any territory. We haven't a single working agent who is clearing, on an average, less than $3 a day. Now, be sure that you understand us: We don't say that lazy, shiftless agents will make $3 a day, for they can't do it at this or any other business, but what we do say is that agents who are willing to work, not too hard, but the same as they would expect to work at any other business, can easily clear $3 a day above all expenses, in any territory, and if they have good territory to work in they can make anywhere from $5 to $7, and even $10 a day. If you want a good chance to work and get good pay for it, you will find it to your interest to read this notice through carefully.

The articles which we have for you to sell are a line of forks, spoons, etc., made of a new metal called "Brazil Silver." We will describe this new line of goods the best we can, then you can judge for yourself whether we are offering you a good chance to make money or not.

BRAZIL SILVER. Warranted for Twenty-five Years.

Brazil Silver is believed to be the very best metal in existence for the manufacture of forks and spoons; it has all the lustre and brilliancy of burnished coin silver, and is much harder and more durable, in fact, it is impossible to wear it out. It is absolutely indestructible. The goods made of this metal are the same all the way through, there being no plating to wear off they will remain as good as new for any length of time. For all practical purposes in the manufacture of table ware this Brazil Silver is superior to coin silver. It is as lustrous and as pure as coin silver, and being much harder it will wear even longer than silver; in fact it is absolutely impossible to wear it out. It will wear forever. As there is no plating to wear off, the metal being the same all the way through, it stands to reason that you can't wear it out. Our confidence in the metal is so great that we guarantee it to wear twenty-five years. We give a guarantee signed by the company warranting the goods to wear and to give perfect satisfaction for twenty-five years. We are an old, strong and thoroughly established firm with ample capital to carry on our business and make our guaranty as good as the Bank of England. In selling these goods an agent can as the Bank of England. In selling these goods an agent can recommend them with the greatest of confidence, for they are just as represented, absolutely indestructible. And, furthermore, our guarantee warranting the goods to give satisfaction for twenty-five years, clears the agent from all responsibility in the matter; for if any article fails to give perfect satisfaction, no matter how long it has been in use, we hold ourselves ready to refund the money read for the entirely. These goods are the no matter how long it has been in use, we hold ourselves ready to refund the money paid for the article. These goods are the same metal all the way through; they will never wear out. They always wear white and bright. We give a guarantee signed by the company, warranting every piece of Brazil Silver to wear twenty-five years. You can sell these goods to your best friends with perfect confidence, for every sale is as much a benefit to your customer as to yourself.

Working with goods that are warranted to wear and give satisfaction for so long a time as twenty-five years, and by a Company, too, whose capital is sufficiently large to make their guarantee good for almost any amount, is an advantage which no other firm is prepared to offer. If you want to make money fast now is the time to do it. If you think that fiveddollar bills are good things to have, now is the time to get them. Never in he history of the agency business have agents had as good a chance to make money rapidly, and it is reasonably sure that they will never have another chance like it.

It is easy to make from $3 to $5 a day at this business.

It is easy to make from $3 to $5 a day at this business.

All Marked with Initial Letters, Without any Extra Cost.

Among all classes there has always been a strong desire to Among an classes there has alread been a strong desire to have their table ware marked with their initial letter, but on ac-count of the heavy expense of having it marked only a very few have been able to afford it. Heretofore the cost of artistically marking table ware has been even greater than the cost of the marking table wait one methods, we are able to offer these goods; now, by our new methods, we are able to offer these elegant Brazil Silver goods, all marked with any initial letter desired in the very highest style of the art, without any extra cost for marking. These Brazil Silver goods, even if unmarked, would be the greatest bargain ever offered the public in table ware, but with the additional and highly desirable feature of being all marked with beautiful and artistic initial letters, these goods are not only great bargains in table ware, but are the greatest bargains of any kind that have ever been offered to the public through agents or in any other way.

The people are always ready enough to buy what they want when it is presented to them in the form of a genuine bargain. Well, here is absolutely the greatest bargain every offered, and the agent who works with it will find that what he has is earnestly desired at nearly every house he visits; it is easy to get orders when you can offer great bargains, that the people really want and can afford.

It is easy to make from $3 to $5 a day at this business.

Table and Dessert Knives.

Our knives are made of the finest tempered cutlery steel and are triple plate, in other words every dozen knives is plated with 12 dwt. of pure silver and hand burnished. Our knives are of the highest grade, fully equal to Rogers' or any knives made. These knives will not wear as long as Brazil Silver goods, but they will wear as long as any knives made. We guarantee them to wear ten years in constant use. If not in constant use they will wear proportionately longer. We give a guarantee, signed by the Company, warranting the knives to wear and to give perfect satisfaction to the purchaser for ten years. As knives are usually used in families they will wear much longer, anywhere from fitteen to twenty years. They are fully equal to Rogers' knives and only cost about two-thirds as much. It may seem strange to some that we can sell so staple an article as silver plated knives at such reduced prices, but we are doing it. It is our way of giving the public good, solid value for their money. We are saving our customers about one-third of the price at which the same grade of knives are sold at the stores and jewelers. Any one who will take the trouble to compare our knives and prices with triple plate 12 dwt. knives sold at the stores and jewelers, will be convinced of the truth of our statements. We are making a profit, of course, but our unequal facilities and immense trade make it possible for us to undersell all competitors, and our customers are getting the benefit of the lowest prices known in the silverware trade. We are not only selling at greatly reduced prices, but we also guarantee every article to be exactly as represented and to give perfect satisfaction to the purchaser, or money refunded.

The First Thing to Do.

If you decide to accept the agency, the first thing to do is to send to us for the agent's case of samples, which is the most complete and perfect case of samples that has ever been pre-pared for the convenience of agents. Our complete and perfect case of samples is not to be compared with anything that has ever been sent to agents before. It contains the very best and most salable articles in the world. There is nothing in the market that agents can sell as fast and sell as easily and make as much money out of, as they can the goods contained in this as much money out of, as they can the goods contained in this splendid case of samples, and everything is arranged and explained so that any agent can't fail to understand just how to go to work to make a great success of the business. As soon as you receive the case of samples you are ready for business. And if you are willing to work you are just as sure to make from $3 to $5 a day as the sun is to rise. Take the case of samples and canvass your territory according to the directions sent with the samples, until you have taken orders for the amount of goods you are prepared to send for. Then order the goods from us and fill your orders, and so continue.

Reckoning the above samples at our lowest retail prices they amount to $2.831-3. We furnish them to agents nicely put up in an elegant sample case or roll, for only $1.00, which is $1.831-3 less than they amount to at our regular retail prices. This is less than one-half of the retail value of the samples, and much less than they cost us. The sample case or roll, which the samples are put up in costs us nearly as much as we require you to send for the samples, case and all.

Wholesale Prices.

Wholesale or agents' prices and all necessary information for carrying on the business will be furnished with the Outfit. Remember we make everything plain to you about wholesale prices, methods, etc., when we send you the Outfit.

VERY IMPORTANT.

The business we are offering is straightforward and honest in everyway, shape and manner. Our goods are in every respect, just as we represent them to be. The Outfit we furnish our agents is exactly as we represent it, and is always sent the same day the order is received, just as agreed. We have tried to state these facts so they could and would be believed and we are constantly receiving letters from parties who would like to engage in the business and would do so if they felt sure we were telling the truth and would do as we agree. Many of these doubters have been cheated and are not altogether to blame for doubting; the most of them say they think we are honest, they say we talk honest, but as they have al-ready been swindled they don't feel like risking even one dollar and so, although our business is in every respect just as represented, and we always do just as we promise, we lose the services of a great many agents and they lose the benefit they might derive from the business because they are afraid we may not be telling the truth. Now, to overcome this spirit of doubt, we have decided to send Samples to all who wish us to do so C. O. D., with privilege of examination at the express office. It costs us from twenty-five to forty cents more to send the samples this way, as we have to pay that amount for return charges on the money, but we are willing to do it and so prove to all that are interested that the Outfit and our goods are just what we claim. If after reading this notice you think you would like to give the business a trial but wish to see the Sample Case be-fore you pay the one dollar cut out the following printed form, fill it out and send it to us and we will send the Outfit to your express office prepaid, and give the express agent instrucyour express office prepaid, and give the express agent instructions to let you thoroughly examine the Outfit, then, if you are satisfied that we have told the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and are also satisfied that you can make money selling our goods, you can pay the express agent one dollar and take the Outfit. If you are not satisfied, you can refuse to take it and the agent will return it to us. No other firm has ever made such an offer. We have adopted this plan in order to convince the most skeptical and to secure the services of all the good working agents in the United States.

This cut shows the Sample Case or Roll, and how the samples This cut shows the Sample Case or Roll, and how the samples appear put up ready for business. The Roll is made of highly finished waterproof canvas, and lined with soft fiannel goods. The samples are held in place by strong straps. The whole rolls up and fastens with a leather strap which is firmly fastened to the back of the Roll. This is the most practical arrangement for carrying the samples that could be thought of. When rolled up the Case is compact and easy to carry. When open the samples show to the best possible advantage, making a good impression at first sight. This Sample Roll gives a business-like appearance; it is substantial and handsome, and invariably gives the impression that there is something valuable inside. All are anxious to see what it is you are carrying around with such care. This is of importance as it secures attention and interest at the start. There is nothing like having your samples put up in a business-like shape; it gives a favorable impression from the start, which is half the battle. It is the same in all matters. A store that looks like business attracts customers; while, from a shanty store, you would not, as a rule, expect the best things. The fact is, in the agency business, as in every other business, you must have things fixed up just right if you expect to succeed. Our Brazil Silver Goods are the best that have ever been offered for the price, or anywhere near it. The new feature of being marked with beautiful and artistic initial letters, free of cost, is the greatest popular hit of the times; and the Sample Roll is arranged so as to show the goods off to the best possible advantage. Furthermore, we carefully teach every agent just how to take advantage of all these splendid qualities and popular features. Is it any wonder that our agents succeed better than those who are working for other firms?

The Editor's Talk.

With this issue Comfort closes its fourteenth volume. We have been looking over our files and we find that there has been a steady and marked improvement in each volume from the very first. The fifteenth volume, which commences with the November issue, will be no exception. It will be the best yet. In fact we promise our readers that the coming volume, will be better than all the rest of the fourteen put together. For our new volume we have arranged a programme of serial stories, short stories, special articles illustrated by photographs, which, with the regular departments and new features yet to be announced will make Comfort the equal of any magazine whose subscription price is $1 a year, instead of the low price of 25 cents.

In this issue we commence two new serial stories. "Under Love's Spell" by May Agnes Fleming, is a story that will hold our readers' attention from start to finish. The other serial story, "Jack Harkaway Out West among the Indians," will, we feel sure, be eagerly read by all our boy readers as well as the grown-ups. To the people of this generation the American Indian is scarcely more than a tradition, a myth, to be found only in history. The remnants of the tribe, now to be found isolated in spots of the great West are but poor specimens of the Indian braves who once possessed this land. To the historian it seems but yesterday that the heroic deeds were wrought which gave name and fame to the great warrior chiefs, such as King Philip, who led the Narragansett and other tribes in the bloody war which bears his name; Powhatan, the powerful Virginia sachem, and father of the beautiful Pocahontas, who saved the life of Captain John Smith; Pontiac, leader of the Ottawas and Pottawatomies, remarkable for his great ability and good judgment; Logan, the eloquent Mingo chief of the Iroquois nation, humane and friendly to the whites; Tecumsch, the Shawnee warrior, brave but kind-hearted, born in in 1768, near Springfield, Ohio; Osceola, the plotting chief of the powerful Seminoles; Black Hawk, the great Pottawattomic chieftain; and the more recent Sioux chief, Sitting Bull, crafty and treacherous, but able withal.

COMFORT has many inquiries from women and girls concerning how they in some way may make money at home, either to help the actual living expenses, or to secure pinmoney for themselves. COMFORT wants to do all it can to help the ladies, old and young, to a little more wealth than Fortune may have favored them with, and it invites them to send suggestions of any and all kinds which will be printed for the hencit of all concerned. No printed for the benefit of all concerned. doubt there are some ways by which money may be made, in town or on the farm, and we want the women readers of COMFORT to suggest in print how it may be done.

Some time ago in The Home Finder column of MUCH OUT COMFORT we told correspondents asking about Arizona Lands to write to Hon. M. A. Smith, Delegate in Congress from that territory, and we are now in receipt of the following letter from that gentleman.

EDITOR COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

DEAR Sire: I have had a large number of letters from different parts of the country asking for information concerning Arizona and mentioring an article in COMFORT. I will be greatly obliged if you will send me a copy of the article, and I enclose ten cents to pay for same. Your kind attention to this will oblige, Yours respectfully, M. A. SMITH. House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Instead of an "article" it was only a line, but it contained the "power", and the Delegate from Arizona has no doubt been surprised to hear from so many people from so many different parts of the country, which shows that COMFORT not only goes everywhere, but the people read it.

comport not only goes everywhere, but the people read it.

As a balm to the overwrought feelings of the gentleman from Arizona who is a man that will work himself to a frazzle for the good of his territory and the benefit of the people and the country at large, Comport's Poet offers these few lines of soothing verse:

To Hon. M. A. Smith of Arizona.

Behold a little line that tells The people where to go
For information; and behold
What plenteous harvests grow.

The Congressman, who loves to take A little needed rest, Is hustled by the seeking crowds To help them in their quest.

Instead of going out to dine
And have a lot of fun In resting-time, he has to put Himself into a run.

And hire a lot of clerks to do The hard, unusual task
That follows when the people have
Some extra things to ask.

It keeps him out of bed of nights, It makes him work all day, And wonder why a statesman can't Pull in some extra pay.

But what's the odds? The Congressman Must grin and bear it all,

For what he's there for is to hear

The people when they call.

And he's all right, and so are they, And so is Comfort that Lets Congressmen and people know Exactly where they're at.

In the mean time if any more of COMFORT'S Home Seekers want to know anything about what a fine country Arizona is let them write to Hon. M. A. Smith, House of Representatives,

The Editor

Squash!!!

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY CHARLES NOEL DOUGLAS.

Copyright, 1902, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

Old uncle Rube way down in Maine had never had no luck,
With corn an' hogs an' such like things, well, he would just allow,
No critter lived in this broad land to touch him anyhow.
But tomaters, taters and the like that most folks have on hand,
He couldn't raise the things for shucks an' mostly bought 'em canned,
But one day in his garden patch he saw and yelled 'Jehosh!'
There, glowin' in the mornin' sun a glorious golden squash.

His good wife heard the shoutin' and swift to the garden hied
And there upon the ground to her astonishment espied
The primest, finest, biggest golden squash that ever over the state of the primest. grew An' she no sooner knew of it than all Maine knew it too.
The news it spread like wild-fire and folks for All rushed to view the yellow beauty nestlin' on the ground,
And uncle Rube swelled out with pride, and said
"Look here by gosh,
I ain't much on tomaters, but I beat the world on squash."

squash."

A mystery 'twas to uncle Rube just how that ol' squash grew,
He'd tried to raise 'em all his life, a hundred times or two.
But the more he dug an' coaxed and tried the less success he had,
Till he just quit in sheer disgust an' went off hoppin' mad.
And now without no tendin' no fixin' and no care lie'd raised a squash that made Creation hump itself an' stare.
A dinner then he vowed he'd give and cut a mighty splosh
And invite all the folks around to help him eat that squash.

The invites they were all sent out, the preparations made, An' uncle Reuben's wife to market sundry trips essayed.
And lovingly did uncle Rube his golden treasure As nature painted it each morn a deeper golden hue. An' folks went in for fastin' so that on th' eventful Ten pounds of squash an' turkey each could nicely stow away.
Then uncle Reuben 'lowed again from Maine way to Oshkosh
There never yet was seen the like of that jim dandy squash.

Now dawned the day of days that was to see the sumptuous feast,
An' as the streaks of rosy light were glimmering in the east
Up bright an' early uncle Rube arose an' took his knife An' sallied to the garden path to take the squash's life, Keen was the blade and strong his grasp an'
swiftly heat his heart,
As now he reached the precious spot an' backward

As now he reached the precious spot an observator gave a start.
"Murder! Thieves!! Police!!!" he yelled. "Great snakes! oh lor' by gosh!"
Some thund'rin' gol darn thief has been an' stole the gosh blame squash."

MONEY TO BE MADE

Cash for Suggestions, Anecdotes and Photographs.

$20 For Suggestions.

We want, as we said in this column last month, to improve COMFORT, and we want to do it in a way that will suit our readers. We are now planning for next year.
What improvement can you suggest? Write us and say what you think we ought to do to improve COMFORT—in its pictures, in its stories, in its various departments. We will give $10 cash to the subscriber sending in the best suggestion and $5, $3 and $2 each to the three next best-in all $20. Only subscribers to COMFORT are eligible to compete. Suggestions should be short and to the point, and under 100 words in length. Say which of the present features and departments you like best. Say which you don't like. Say what you would like that we now haven't got. They must reach us before the 10th of each month and should be addressed:

Suggestion Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

We Pay for Anecdotes.

COMPORT wants good anecdotes of people or things, local, state or national and will pay for them. Every reader of COMFORT knows some good short anecdote about some person or place, and if he or she will tell it in writing and submit it to us, the money will be paid promptly for it if it is acceptable. Literary excellence is not asked for—the story is the thing, but it must be a story that has never been printed. We want something new. Some of those interesting things that never get beyond the small circle of talkers unless somebody writes them.

For such stories COMFORT will pay one cent a word if the story is 100 words or less in length, and one-half a cent a word beyond the 100 word limit. That is, a story of fifty words will bring the writer fifty cents, 100 words a $1.00, and 150 words, $1.25.

Now men and women, COMFORT readers, professional writers and everybody else who can tell a story get out your pencils and give yourselves a chance to earn some extra money. Address Anecdote Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

$1.00 EACH for PHOTOS.

COMFORT wants photographs of interesting People, Places and Things. They may be of historical houses, monuments, localities, graves, churches, trees, bridges, or anything else that has more than a mere local interest. There is something of this sort in almost every community where there are COMFORT readers. If not of such interest, there may be things that are peculiar and which are not found elsewhere, from a double headed calf to a chicken with four legs or some person who has done something extraordinary. We especially want photographs of men or women who are 100 years old or upwards.

Now you know what we want, and if you have a camera of your own and can take the photograph, or can get one any other way, and will send it to us, we will give you ONE DOLLAR for it, if acceptable, and you write enough description with it so those who see it when we print it will know what it is. Any size photograph will answer, if it is very sharp and clear, but we prefer them not less than 2 1-2 by 3 1-2 inches. In many cases you can buy in the stores or from the local photographer pictures that will answer our purpose. LOCAL PHOTOGRAPHERS THEM-SELVES MAY BE ABLE TO MAKE A DOL-LAR OR TWO BY LOOKING INTO THIS OFFER. COMFORT wants the pictures and their description and will not be at all exacting. If the matter can be used at all, you may be sure of getting your dollar, and getting it promptly for anything we accept. Address

After thirty years of study Dr. Schenk wrote the book and made the statement that he could determine the sex of children before birth, and that boys or girls might be born as parents desired. A great many people of the highest prominence were interested and Dr. Schenck became famous. But his theories were not altogether correct and he lost favor and finally went back into obscurity, and lost his place as Professor in the Vienna University. He died in August, at Schwanberg, Syria.

Mrs. Nelson will get more than a million dollars in any event, but if it is shown that Mr. Fair died before his wife, then the whole estate will go to the heirs of Mrs. Fair, and this amounts to eight or ten millions. It is an ill wind that blows nobody good.

A bench warrant was issued for him by a New York Court, on complaint of A. F. Power of the New England Manufacturers' Association. Mr. Power claims malicious prosecution and put his damages at $150,000. The trouble was about business matters. Gov. Kimball staid away from Newport.

17. Americans have too much of the strenuous life. They make wrecks of themselves by overwork whenever they have the opportunity. During the past year or two, no man has been more talked of than Charles M. Schwab, President of the "Billion Dollar" Steel Company, and the tremendous work he accomplished. In less than twenty-five years he had risen from a position of $2.50 a week as a store boy to the Presidency of the great steel company at a salary said to be one million dollars a year. He has made millions, and was still at it, When the blow came, and now at the age of forty, he must quit all his business and take absolute rest, or become a mental wreck with only a short time to live. Nature will assert herself.

18. Several years ago America lost one of her richest young women, Miss Consuelo Vanderbilt of New York City. She became the wife of the Duke of Marlborough, and went to live in England, her money doing much to restore the ancient ducal palaces of the Marlboroughs. As the Duchess she became very popular, and she remained on the other side until a few weeks ago when she returned to this country on a visit. She had been expecting to have a gay time socially, but the death by automobile of Mr. Fair in France, whose sister is Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, Jr., made many changes in her social engagements.

CHAPTER I.

JACK MAKES NEW FRIENDS.

Should you ask me whence these stories? Whence these legends and traditions, With the odors of the forest, With the odors of the forest, With the curling smoke of wigwams, With the curling smoke of wigwams, With the rushing of great rivers, With their frequent repetitions, And their wild reverberations, As of thunder in the mountains? I should answer, I should tell you, From the forest and the prairies, From the great lakes of the Northland, From the land of the Ojibways. From the land of the Dakotahs, From the mountains, moors, and fenlands, Where the heron, the Shuh-shuh-gah, Feeds among the reeds and rushes."

ALT!" It was the voice of Sublette, the guide.
For ten days Jack Harkaway's party had been traveling over the prairie, and had left Cheyenne City some distance behind them.
Making an average of thirty miles a day, they had traversed Nebraska, crossed several important rivers, among them the Platte, the Niobrara, or l'Eau qui Court, and the White Earth, entering the country of the Sioux in Dakota.

Dakota.

The guide's exclamation was the signal for "nooning."

Jack Harkaway was dressed in an entire suit

Jack Harkaway was dressed in an entire suit of buckskin; he rode his horse Lightning, was armed with his rifle Grim Death, as well as a pair of revolvers and a bowie.

Springing from the saddle, he slipped the bridle off his horse, and threw a stout lariat round his neck, which he fastened to a peg in the ground. The mule which carried the stores was treated in a similar manner by the Frenchman, Varney Bonneau, who, owing to Monday's illness, had taken the place of "head cook and bottle-washer" to the expedition.

Billy Shoot-dead and Hank Smith were Jack's body guard, and they threw themselves down and lighted their pipes, smoking in stolid silence.

"That is ver good," exclaimed Varney Bonneau, surveying the horse and mule, after he

"That is ver good," exclaimed Varney Bonneau, surveying the horse and mule, after he had fixed them in a position where the grass waved high. "If ze sacre Indians come into our corral, I guess ve can show them how to shoot, by gar!"

He proceeded to light a fire, over which huge chunks of dried venison were soon cooking.

A keg carried by the mule supplied water, and in another small cask was cold tea, which was highly relished by the men as a thirst-quencher, and indeed nothing better could have been taken under a hot sun.

Sublette, the guide, came up to Harkaway.

have been taken under a hot sun.
Sublette, the guide, came up to Harkaway, and said, in a low tone:
"Tonight I reckon to reach the place where I left Mr. Hunston."
"It is about time," replied Jack.
"Should he be dead from the effects of his wounds, you will not blame me?"
"Certainly not."
"I have done my best to guide you to him without delay."
"That is so," said Jack, "and if he is alive or dead, providing I get the valuable papers he has of mine, I will reward you handsomely."
"Of course that is understood," replied Sublette.

As he turned away, there was a subdued smile on his thin lips, which escaped the notice of Harkaway, who find joined Hank and Billy Shoot-dead.

tice of Harkaway, who flad joined Hank and Billy Shoot-dead.

The former was looking through a glass at some object in the distance, which he regarded with considerable interest.

"What can you see?" asked Jack.

"Injun," replied Hank, curtly.

"Where away?"

"On the prairie, yonder."

"Give us hold," said Billy Shoot-dead. "I can't see no Injuns."

"Air yer blind as well as foolish?" answered Hank, with a grunt of contempt. "Do yer s'pose I can't tell Injun when I see them?"

"I know you're a mighty big hunter, and can tell a'most anything with the naked eye," said Billy; "but you see I aren't no child."

"Wal, what's yer opinion of them black specks over to windward?"

"Them's buffler."

"So air you buffler!" replied Hank, with a loud laugh. "I am ready to swow that what yer can see is Injun."

"P'raps yer can tell what tribe they belong to," said Billy Shoot-dead.

"I can so. They's Apaches."

"Not by a long chalk. You don't get the Apaches up in the territory, onless they're on a raid," said Billy.

"Wall, I guess that's just what's the a raid," said Billy.

"Wall, I guess that's just what's the trouble."

Billy Shoot-dead took a long look in the direction first indicated by Hank, and was at last, much to his chagrin, obliged to admit that what he had taken to be buffalo were, in reality, a band of mounted Indians.

These however, did not venture to approach the whites. Perhaps they did not perceive them. At any rate, they wheeled about their horses, and soon disappeared on the verge of the horizon.

norses, and soon disappeared on the verge of the horizon.

"The red pison's gone," said Hank with a grunt of satisfaction, "and I can't say I'm at all sorry. Wal, boys, I reckon it's time to be movin'. Look smart, Monsieur Bonneau, and let's be making tracks."

In a short time the party were again in mo-hours we shall strike the south fork of the Big Cheyenne River."

"Do we cross it?"

"No. Our path lies on this side, towards the region of the Black Hills."

"That is the very heart of the Sioux country," said Jack, a little nervously.

"You are right. It was there Mr. Hunston met with his wound, and I was obliged to leave him where he fell, in charge of some friendly Indians," answered Sublette, coolly.

Jack said nothing more, though he looked carefully ahead, fearful of a surprise.

He had gone too far to retreat, and if Sublette contemplated treachery, all he could do was to guard against being taken unawares.

The sun was sinking into the bosom of the fleecy western clouds when the party neared the banks of the Big Cheyenne River.

A dark, gloomy, apparently impenetrable forest came down to the edge of the river, stretching for half a dozen miles in length, and about two in depth.

From the woods issued strange noises.

Among these could be distinguished the howling of the wolf, the peculiar croaking of the tree-toads, the hoot of the owl, the shrill screech of the night-hawk, and, what was more alarming than all, the angry scream of the panther.

"See!" suddenly exclaimed Hank "there's a panther.

"See!" suddenly exclaimed Hank, "there's a deer on the edge of the forest."
Billy Shoot-dead raised his rifle, and was about to fire.
"Keep upint" exclaimed Hank, "there's a deer on the edge of the forest."

about to fire.

"Keep quiet," exclaimed Hank; "let the Colonel have the first shot. I want to see if he knows how to use his shooting-iron."

Jack steadied Lightning as soon as the game was pointed out to him, and raising Grim Death to his shoulder took a hasty aim.

There was a flash and a sharp crack.
The deer rolled over on its side, dead.
But at the same moment the sound of a sec-

But at the same moment the sound of a second shot was heard. Could it be an echo?

"The deer is yours," he added. "I am very sorry that I should have raised the question of proprietorship in the rather stubborn manner I did, but I hope you will excuse me when I tell you that I'm a new hand at hunting, and should have really felt proud if I had shot that deer."

"Better luck next time," said Jack. "However, you are perfectly welcome to half the beast, if you will honor me by accepting it."

"Oh! no, thank you," replied the stranger.
"I am well provisioned."

"Are you in camp about here?"

"Not far off. We have made camp in the woods, as we have been troubled by Sioux during the day. Did you meet Indians?"

"We saw a band of what we took to be Apaches in the morning; but they did not molest us in any way," answered Jack.
Billy Shoot-dead had been regarding the young stranger attentively for some time.

"Say," he said, "aren't you along with Captain Villard, the commander at Fort Sully?"

"Yes," was the reply. "I am his nephew."

"Wal, now," said Billy, "I thought I'd seen you in Chevenne City, and when I set eyes on yer, the idea stuck as fast in my head as a bee in a boy's har."

yer, the idea stuck as fast in my head as a bee in a boy's har."

"I heard of you before I started," said Jack, much pleased at knowing who he was speaking to. "You are Mr. Lyle Leland, I believe?"

"That is my name," was the answer.

"My name is Harkaway," said Jack, "and I am proud to make your acquaintance. My journey is nearly ended, I am sorry to say, or I should have been glad to have had the pleasure of traveling with you."

"My uncle and myself, Mr. Harkaway, would have been delighted to have enjoyed your society," replied Lyle Leland.

"Wal," said Hank, "I guess you'd better bring the captain up and jine us in eatin' a chunk of this venison."

"Not a bad idea," answered Lyle Leland, with a smile. "Set to and cook it. Our camp is not far off. We will shift and join you, as you hospitably suggest."

He nodded gaily to Jack, and disappeared in

He nodded gaily to Jack, and disappeared in the woods, having so marked the path by which he came that he had little or no difficulty in retracing his steps.

"No," replied Jack, "I only fired one shot."
"That's what I'm a thinking, but I'll swow I heard two go off when the deer was keeled over."

heard two go off when the deer was keeled over."

"P'rap's," said Billy Shoot-dead, "it's one of those extraordinary echoes as these wood is full of."

"Go to Oregon," replied Hank. "It worn't no echo. Not it."

Curious to set the matter at rest, Jack touched his horse with the whip, and rather imprudently galloped up to the spot where the deer had fallen.

He had segreely received it when a fall.

He had scarcely reached it when a tall, gentlemanly young man stepped out of the wood and advanced to the same place.

Jack reined in his horse, and looking at the newcomer, exclaimed:

newcomer, excialined:

"My shot, I believe."

"We fired very much at the same time," answered the young man, "and I am vain enough to believe that my shot killed the deer, and that the venison is mine."

"I won't be positive," replied Jack.

"Nor I. The matter is easily settled. What bullet do you fire with?"

"A conical," replied Jack, taking a cartridge from his pouch and showing it.

"I use the old-fashioned round ball," said the stranger.

By this time the remainder of the party had come up, and showed great interest in the proceedings.

Fresh venison for supper was a treat which no one liked to forego, and the result of the examination was watched for with considerable

At length the handsome young stranger

At length the handsome young stranger began to cut up the deer.

In this process he came to the bullet, which he extracted, and held up to the light between his finger and thumb.

"It is your shot," he said.

The ball was conical in shape.

There was a slight air of chagrin and disappointment about him as he spoke.

His frank and genial manner won Jack's heart at once.

Jack was much pleased to think that he had fortunately overtaken Captain Villard and his nephew, Lyle Leland.

He had heard in Cheyenne City that they had quitted a little earlier than himself, to traverse very nearly the same line of country.

Captain Villard was an officer of distinction in the American army.

Captain Villard was an officer of distinction in the American army.

He had served in the Mexican war, and fought for his country during the rebellion, placing his sword on the side of the North.

In a short time, Lyle Leland returned with his uncle, who expressed himself glad to make the acquaintance of Harkaway.

A fire had been kindled, and the stores carried by mule ransacked to provide as elegant a supply as the occasion could afford.

"This is quite a pleasant meeting, Mr. Harkaway," said the captain.

"And all the more agreeable because it was unexpected," said Leland.

"And all the more agreeable because it was unexpected," said Leland.
"I am only sorry that we shall have to part company tomorrow," remarked Jack.
"Are you traveling for sport and pleasure?" inquired Villard.
"Not exactly," answered Jack. "I certainly enjoy the journey, and shall try for buffalo before I return; but I am going to the side of an old enemy of mine, who has stolen property belonging to me."

belonging to me.'
"Indeed!"

"Indeed!"
"He was hiding in the wilderness and got wounded by the Indians. Thinking himself dying, he sent for me to make reparation."
"Better late than never," said the captain,

"Guess you've seen signs of Injuns, captin'?" said Hank.

said Hank.

"Yes," answered the captain. "We had to show them our heels this morning, and did not feel sorry when we reached the woods."

"Was they Sioux?"

"Undoubtedly. We are in the Sioux country now. I should not have traveled unaccompanied had I not thought them peaceable, but I fear they are going to break out."

"An Injun, cap, will a'most allers rob and murder when he's got the chance," observed Billy Shoot-dead.

"They are a treacherous race."

"They are a treacherous race."

"Did you ever kill an Injun, cap?"

"Oh yes, I have killed several."
"Shake on that," said Billy, holding out his hand. "I've no sorter respect for the man who hasn't kill his Injun."

hasn't kill his Injun."

"The painted skunks—ugh! how I hate 'em!"
exclaimed Hank.

"I've lost more'n one friend through them," continued Billy Shoot-dead. "Last fail, I heard as they'd tomahawked Long Sam Parsons. You'd better believe I swore a few. Lor!
how I ripped and cursed when they told me that Long Sam had gone up."

Lyle Leland looked at Jack and said:

"Mr. Harkaway, will you take a stroll?"

"With pleasure," answered Jack.

Billy Shoot-dead was in the act of taking an cnormous chew of tobacco.

Billy Snoot-dead was in the act of taking an enormous chew of tobacco.

Suspending the important operation, he exclaimed, in a familiar manner, peculiar to him:

"Look hyar, boys, I kinder cotton to yer, and if you'll take my warning, you'll not go far from camp."

"We'll look out, my friend," answered Lyle.

"The pesky varmints is about and we're got.

"We'll look out, my friend," answered Lyle.
"The pesky varmints is about, and we've got to keep awake if we don't want our har raised."
"All right, Billy," said Jack; "as you're so anxious about my hair, I'll promise you it shall not adorn the belt of a Sioux chief tonight, at all events."

The two young men strolled away together, keeping out of gunshot of the woods, and walking over the green, waving prairie grass.
"Don't it seem strange to you to be wandering on the confines of civilization in the boundless West?" asked Lyle Leland.
"Yes," replied Jack; "I can scarcely realize it, though my life has been a very adventurous one."

"I have not left Yale more than a year," said

"I have not left Yale more than a year," said Leland.
"You must be fond of adventures, or you would not be here."
"Not at all," exclaimed the young man, whose pensive countenance darkened. "I have been studying law, and, indeed, have a fine propect before me, but I gave all up to come here."

"Why, may I ask, if the question is not an impertinent one?" said Jack.

Without knowing the reason, he began to take a great liking to the young American, who was as intelligent as he was handsome and who was as intelligent as he was handsome and gentlemanly.

"I will tell you with pleasure," replied Lyle Leland. "I had a brother, Valentine Leland, and a sister, Viola. They undertook a journey last fall to Fort Sully, where my uncle is stationed."

He paused abruptly and dashed a tear-drop from his eye.
"They arrived safely, I hope?" said Jack.
"On the contrary, they were never heard of, and to this day no trace of them has been disand to this day no trace of them has been discovered."

"That is sad."

"You see, Mr. Harkaway, that in quitting civilization and coming out here, I have only made up my mind to perform a simple duty."

"Quite so."

"If my brother and sister are dead, I will, to the best of my ability, avenge their murders. If they are held prisoners by the Indians, I will try to rescue them."

"It is a noble resolve, and I honor you for it," said Jack.
"I could not rest in Boston, where my home

"I could not rest in Boston, where my home is," continued Lyle Leland, "when I thought of my dear Viola being in the power of the red fiends."

"No one could wonder at your being dis-essed."

"No one could wonder at your being distressed."
"Well," said Lyle, trying to be a little more cheerful, "here I am, and I hope my journey will have some result."
"Are you going on to Fort Sully with Captain Villard?" inquired Jack.
"Yes. We intended to cross the Cheyenne River early tomorrow morning. You see, uncle is a very wealthy man, and will do all he can to aid me."
"That is well."

That is well."

"That is well."
"I can have a portion of his command to accompany me in my researches."
"Does your uncle like his occupation?"
"Not very much. He is too good a soldier to grumble at the orders of his superiors, but he is not held in great favor at the War Department. I don't know how it is, but he has not been rewarded as he deserves. He should have been a general by this time, and he is still a simple captain."

Jack now understood why he felt interested in Lyle Leland. There was that animal mag-

Jack now understood why he felt interested in Lyle Leland. There was that animal magnetism between them which always exists between two noble spirits.

The romance which tinged the life of the young student, fresh from the academic shades of Yale, was of that class which throws a halo round a man.

What could be grander than his resolve to throw himself among the savages, in the hope of clearing up the mystery which hung over the fate of his brother and sister?

If he could help him at all in his search, Jack determined to do so.

The shades of night were fast falling as they returned to camp. Hank had piled fresh pine-knots on the fire. The others had wrapped themselves in their blankets; but the sturdy hunter, with his rifle across his knees, was on the lookout.

"It's my watch," he said, as Jack approached.
"Let me relieve you in a couple of hours." determined to do so.

"Let me relieve you in a couple of hours," said Jack.
"Wal," answered Hank, "ef yer like to take the next spell yer welcome. I'll rouse yer up."
"Thanks," replied Jack. "I wish to take my turn with the rest of you, and you need not be afraid of leaving the safety of the camp in my hands."

"I aren't afeerd of you," replied Hank. "It's chaps like him I expect trouble from."
He jerked his arm in the direction of Sublette, as he spoke; but the guide had, to all vappearance, already gone to sleep, and did not hear the remark.

Soon Lyle Leland and Jack were rolled in their hisparksts, and throwing themselves on the Soon Lyle Leiand and Jack were rolled in their blankets, and throwing themselves on the ground, fell into a deep slumber. Hank lighted his pipe, and kicking the logs into a blaze, walked up and down like a sentinel on guard. There was little danger of surprise while he was watching.

CHAPTER II.

SUBLETTE'S CONDUCT IS SUSPICIOUS.

SUBLETTE'S CONDUCT IS SUSPICIOUS.

Hank Smith was a firm believer in the equal distribution of labor, and when he had watched as long as he thought he ought to, he determined to wake up some one else. Harkaway's request that he might take his share with the rest occurred to him. He was about to rouse him, when Sublette rose up with a yawn, and exclaimed:

"What are you doing, friend Smith?"
"Bout to wake the boss. I'm kinder inclinated to get inside my blanket, seeing I've been on the look-out since you fellows took to snoring."

"Let me take a turn," answered the guide; "though what you've got to be afraid of I don't

"though what you've got to be an an all know."

"Wal," said Hank, "to start with, there's Injuns in plenty about."

"I'll keep a right smart look-out, never fear," answered Sublette.

Hank threw himself down to get to sleep, and the guide sat upon the trunk of a fallen tree, watching the sleepers with considerable eagerness. It happened that Jack had been roused by the conversation which had taken place between the hunter and guide, for the latter had spoken rather loudly in his defence of the Indians. of the Indians.

It seemed odd that Sublette, who was not at all of a self-sacrificing sort of nature, should volunteer to put himself on guard. Jack determined to keep from going to sleep again and to watch him.

The guide's intelligent face had contracted

The guide's intelligent face had contracted in the glimmering shadows, and it worked passionately, as he sometimes raised his arm and muttered to himself.

"All, all shr ll die at one swoop," Jack heard him say; "they sleep, never to wake again." He gave one more searching look upon the slumbering party, and carrying his rifle at the trail, quitted the encampment, striking the forest a few hundred yards higher up, and disappearing in its gloomy depths. Jack rose instantly. He touched Hank on the shoulder.

"Get up, quickly," he said.

"What's got you, Colonel?" asked the hunter, rubbing his eyes."

"Sublette's gone off in the woods, and it's my opinion he's going to bring the reds down on us."

"Ethet ro?"

on us."
"That so?"

Jack hastily aroused Lyle Leland, to whom "Will you kindly wake the others," he said,
"and keep as good a lookout as possible against a surprise?"
"Certainly—and you?"
"I intend to follow the guide if Hank, who is an old hunter and backwoodsman, will come with me."

an old hunter and backwoodsman, will come with me."

"Good enough!" exclaimed Hank. "Did you see what direction the fellow's trail tuk?"

"Be smart," said Jack. "I can show you."

Jack led the way to where he had seen the guide disappear in the woods.

"It was somewhere about here," he said.

"Right. I see a path," replied Hank, bending down. "Let me go first. Keep close up to me, and go snake-like. Don't step on a dry twig, if you can help it, as the leastest sound may warn the skunks that we're on the trail."

It was very dark in the woods, and only an occasionally gleam of moonlight penetrated through the dense foilage of oak and maple which towered over the scrub, which was chiefly made up of wild cherry crab, and brambles.

But a path, tolerably well defined, had been

But a path, tolerably well defined, had been struck by Sublette.

The hunter argued in his own mind that the Indians were not far off, because Sublette would not run the risk of being long away from camp.

Someone might awake, and if he was missed his absence would excite suspicion in the minds of all.

minds of all.

After going in a laborious manner, sometimes on hands and knees, at others crawling on their stomachs, irritated by the switchings of twigs on the face, which flew as they were bent back, and bleeding from scratches innumerable, Hank reckoned they had traveled a mile and a half.

Suddenly he came to an abrupt halt.

"What is it?" whispered Jack. "Indians?"

"No, Colonel. it's water," was the reply.

"Then we have struck the banks of the river?"

river?"
"That's so.

"That's so.
"I did not know we were so near."
"Nor, I; but the Cheyenne makes a bend here, I reckon. Now we're here, let's hunt for a dug-out.
"If there's Injuns in camp anywhere near, there's sartin to be a canoe or two not far off. Stay you there."
"Right" answered Jack.
He sat down upon the moss-covered trunk of a tree, looking out upon the moonlit river a tree, looking out upon the moonlit river swiftly rushing down to join the mighty Mis-souri, some hundreds of miles off.

Soon he hoped to see Hunston, receive from him the deeds which would make him a rich man, and return to civilization and happiness.

Man proposes, and God disposes.

Many months had to elapse before he had a chance of realizing these expectations. Months of hardship, exposure, danger, and privation.

Hank Smith was not gone more than ten

When he came back, he said:

When he came back, he said:
"I've found the canoes—two of 'em, made of birch, not dug-outs, light as a feather. I guess I'll take the bearing of the spot, so that I can find it again, in case of need."
"You mean that the canoes will be useful if we are chased and want to make our escape? said Jack.

"That's just the idea."

"What is the next move?"

"We'll keep on prospectin.' The path twists up to the right, and I fancy I can smell the smoke of a wood-fire."

They kept on in the way indicated by Hank, and re-entered the forest for the space of half and re-entered and a mile.

Then the hunter stopped again.

He held up his hand to urge extreme caution upon Harkaway, who almost held his breath.

Hank came back a step or two, and whispered:

"There they are. Look at the varmints.
Rise up a little bit."
Raising himself up in the brushwood Jack beheld a sight which made his blood tingle.
For the first time in his life he looked up-

Sitting round a fire were about twenty Sioux, and amongst them was Sublette, the guide.

In the midst was an Indian nearly six feet three inches in height.

He wore splendid mocassins, richly ornamented with beads and colored quills. His hair was tied up, and had several feathers in it.

By his side lay a rifle of improved shape and make, which had killed many an unwary trav-

In a belt he displayed a pair of pistols and a hunting knife with two edges.

"Mishe-mock-war," whispered Hank.
"Who is he?"

"The Great Bear. I didn't tell that thief Sublette I knew him; but once he went near raisin' my wool. He's a big chief, you bet. Listen!"

Mishe-mock-war stretched out his hand for the pipe which had gone round the circle of warriors.

Jack had a good opportunity of noticing the Sioux Indians, who all had their colored blankets drawn closely around them.
A more savage, blood-thirsty, utterly villainous and ferocious set he had never set eyes on.

Sublette was talking earnestly. "Come in the night time," he said, "and take the scalps of the travelers. Captain Villard is with them, and he's your enemy. I have promised to do this thing for my Indian brothers, and so I deliver them into your hands."

The Great Bear smoked slowly and silently for the present a minute.

for the space of a minute.

Then he spoke.

"Our brother says well," he said. "His voice is like music in my ears. We have dug up the hatchet and are on the war-path. The whites must die. My young men are eager for their scalps. It is many moons since my braves have tasted blood, and the hand of the Wankarusa has been heavy upon them."

There was a chorus of approval at this

Jack whispered to Hank:
"Who is the Wankarusa?"
"Nobody knows," answered the same cautious voice.

"How? "For the last twelve months Indians have been found dead in all parts of Dakota; on their foreheads was a mark in the shape of a dagger—thus †. This is the mark of the man who kills the redskins, who has named him who kills the redskins, who has named him the Wankarusa."

"Why?" asked Jack.

"Because they say he has sworn to wade hip-deep in the blood of the reds; Wankarusa, in their language, signifying 'Hip deep.'"

"Then he has sustained some great injury at their honds"

"Then he has sustained some great injury at their hands."

"Nary doubt -shish! The guide's going to speak agin."

"My brothers," said Sublette, "know my friend with one arm. They have spoken and eaten with him. He is a man, though his skin is white." is white."
"Wagh! he is a man," answered the Great

"He is in the lodges of the Sioux," continued Sublette; "and the medicine men have said that he is to be the mate of Umentucken, the Mountain Lamb, who has lived in the lodges of the Sioux for twice six moons.

A young brave jumped at this, his eyes flashing angrily.
"One-arm is a great chief, but the Young

"One-arm is a great chief, but the Young Snake is much bigger. Umentucken, the Mountain Lamb, will enter no lodge unless she is the Squaw of the Young Snake. If Sublette says she will, he lies."

"That time is far off," interrupted Great Bear. "Young Snake is a brave, who will try to take the scalps of the white men. Masta Sheela (white man), very poor now. Let us hang his hair at our belts."

There was an emphatic grunt of approval, and the young chief, Young Snake, subsided into private life, though it appeared as if he was much concerned about Sublette's remark respecting Umentucken, the Mountain Lamb, whom he had especially devoted in his own mind as an ornament for his wigwam.

Jack remembered the conversation he had entired with Lalvette will be the state of the state

Jack remembered the conversation he had enjoyed with Lyle Leland.

He wondered if the Mountain Lamb, who had been only twice six moons with the Sioux, which, of course, meant six months, could be the sister whom Lyle mourned as lost. Of Sublette's treachery there was no doubt

Of Sublette's treachery there was no doubt whatever.

He was urging upon his friends, the redskins, immediate murder of the white men.

His conduct was as black and diabolical as his cowardly heart.

The allusion to "One-arm" made Jack think of Hunston, whom he supposed to be in some village of the Sioux.

That Jack had been led into a trap was as plain as daylight.

plain as daylight.

But, providently, he had got wind of the guide's intentions just in time.

The proposed massacre might yet be prevented, and a terrible revenge taken upon the wretch who suggested it.

"Hank," whispered Jack, "let's give it them red hot."
"Not much," replied the hunter. "See hyar,

"Not much," replied the hunter. "See hyar, they outnumber us, and are all armed with modern rifles. If it came to be a case of red-hot fightin,' we might get it as well as they."

"My fingers itch to fire."

"So does mine. You're young at scoutin' or you wouldn't be so anxious. Creep along after me and we'll get outer this."

Jack made no remonstrance, and slowly followed the hunter on the backward track.

"Hold on," said Hank, after they had gone a little way. "Can you see inter their camp?"

"Yes," replied Jack.

"They're a puttin' skins on them, aren't they?"

"It seems as if they were."

"And they've got bones in their hands. The

"It seems as if they were."

"And they've got bones in their hands. The consarned cusses are up to an old dodge."

"What's that?" inquired Jack.

"I'll tell yer when we get a little ways off. Let's strike straight for the perairie, and run up to camp. They'll come by the path we tuck in startin'."

in startin'."

Rising to their feet, the two men with difficulty pushed their way through the junglelike wood, and at length reached the prairie.
Their camp-fire could be distinguished, glimmering like a star some distance off.

"Run," said Hank; "we ain't got no time at all to lose."

They ran at the top of their speed until they got quite close to the camp.

"Now tell me," said Jack, "what the dodge

"Now tell me," said Jack, "what the dodge is?"

"They're a-going to put on wolf-skins, and creep along. Those bones they've got in their hands they'll rattle till they make the noise of wolves snappin' their jaws, which is a common noise, and we shouldn't think nothin' of it."

"The artful beggars!" said Jack. "That would have taken me in."

"And it's taken a lot more'n yer in, Cap," replied Hank. "Yer reckon it's wolves a-gazin' at yer, and don't count it worth while to fire on 'em. All of a suddint up they gets with whoops and yells, and yer's tomyhawked to a man before yer know where yer har's gone ter."

THE "1900" BALL-BEARING FAMILY WASHER

Createst Time, Labor and Expense Saver for the Home Ever Invented. Every Household Needs One.

No More Rubbing, Stooping, Boiling, Wearing Out of Clothes. Monday's Washing No Longer a Drudgery. Only Perfect Washer Made.

SENT ABSOLUTELY FREE

without Advance Payment or Deposit of any Kind, Freight Paid, on 30 Days' Trial. May be Returned Free of Expense if not Satisfactory.

The "1900" Ball-Bearing Washer is unquestionably the greatest labor-saving machine ever invented for family use. Entirely new principle. It is simplicity itself. It revolves on bicycle ball-bearings, making it by far the easiest running washer on the market. No strength required. No more stooping, rubbing, boiling of clothes. Hot water and soap all that is needed. It will wash large quantities of clothes (no matter how soiled) perfectly clean in six minutes.

The "1900" Washer will wash collars and cuffs, laces, cambrics and the most delicate materials perfectly clean and positively without tearing or wearing them out to the slightest degree. It will wash blankets, bedspreads, carpets, etc., just as easily and thoroughly.

The "1900" Washer not only prevents wear and tear, but it saves soaps, materials and a great deal of time and hard work. As shown in the illustrations, which are not at all exaggerated, with the "1900" Washer an ordinary wash may be finished at 9 A.M., while with the old-fashioned washboard it would take several hours longer and the work would be very much harder.

ABSOLUTE PROOF FROM USERS OF THE "1900" WASHER.

$1,000.00 Will Be Paid to Any One Who Can Prove That Any of the Following Letters Are Not Genuine:

VERNA P. O., VIRGINIA, March 4, 1992.
GENTLEMEN-The "1990" Washer is the best, cleanest and easiest washer that I have ever seen. Clothes need no hand-rubbing whatever, as the machine cleans them better than by hand. All that is necesary is to have the water ready and the machine properly used does the rest. It is undoubtedly the best washing machine on the market.

GEORGE M. COUNCILL, Postmaster.

KANSAS CITY, Mo., May 14, 1902.
I have given your washer a fair trial. It is the best washer I ever saw. It has washed our heavy blankets with perfect case. I washed them last spring and rubbed more than an hour and yet they had to go through again, but the "1900" Washer cleaned them thoroughly clean. We do our washing so quick and have no tired and wornout feeling as of old. I wish every lady had a washer.

MRS. J. L. BANNER, 4203 Troost Ave.

REMEMBER—You take absolutely no risk, incur no expense or obligation whatever. The washer is sent by us on 30 days' trial, freight prepaid going and coming, and positively without any advance or deposit of any kind.

I cannot praise it too high. I don't see how I have done without it before. No more backache. It is a Godsend to weak women. Please accept my heartfelt thanks to you, for it is the first free trial lever sent for that was indeed free.

MRS. CARRIE STAFFORD.

BUTLER, N. J., October 22, 1901.
Your washer is the best and easiest ever made. I never saw its equal. One of my sons, who is an engineer gets his over-clothes very dirty. They have been washed by your "1900" Washer just as clean as when they were new. It washes everything perfectly clean. It runs so easy that my little granddaughter did the first two tubs full. It is a marvel and I would not part with it for $100. In two months it will pay for itself. Respectfully, MRS. MARTHA WITTY.

"Sublette is a traitor," said Jack. "We came across a band of Indians, and heard him urge them to come and massacre us in our sleep."
"I wish I had some soldiers here," remarked Captain Villard. "If I had entertained any idea that the Indians were going to take the war-path, I wouldn't have quitted my post even to meet you, Lyle."

"I am sorry, sir," answered Lyle Leland, "if I have been the cause of any dereliction of duty on your part."

"Oh, no. I don't suppose I shall get into any trouble at Washington, but it is unfortunate that I should have led you into danger."

"Don't bother about me, uncle," replied Lyle. "I have come out here on a sacred mission, and must have met the Indians sooner or later. Better soon than late, perhaps."

"Let Mr. Harkaway tell us what is really to be expected," said Captain Villard.

Jack related what they had heard, and how the Sioux, under Mishe-mock-war, and instigated by the double-dyed treachery of Sublette, were about to creep upon them in the guise of wolves.

Love, the Sleuth.

Hearts vs. Detectives in the "Great Purinton Mill Mystery."

BY HOLMAN F. DAY.

Copyright, 1902, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

(Caleb Brett, an aged and prominent citizen of Manafield village drew a considerable sum of money from the bank on a certain foremoon and was seen to enter Purinton's mill on the edge of the village. He did not reappear and later a searching party found his old beaver hat on a slab pile at the foot of a sluice leading from the upper part of the mill where he had entered. It was considered probable that the old man had come to his death by falling down the sluice. The atrange part of the affair was that the body had been removed by persons unknown—admitting the presumption that he was really dead. Several persons were in the mill at or near the time he was seen to enter. His nephew, George Brett, with whom he had been having troubled about the young man's proposed marriage to a girl below him in social standing; Arthur Wing, the village printer and a suitor for the squire's grand-daughter, a young man obnoxious to the squire's grand-daughter, a young man obnoxious to the squire's paniel Purinton, owner of the mill and one who was intending to borrow from the old man that day. After some weeks both George Brett and Arthur Wing were arrested on suspicion of having been concerned in the old man's taking off. Brett was released on small bonds after certain testimony seemed to throw the burden of the matter on Wing. At the hearing granted to Wing before a local trial justice a small boy brought in a note signed by Caleb Brett, apparently, but written by another hand. In the note the squire declared that he was still alive. The note bore such resemblance to a forgery after it had been examined that the justice refused to release Arthur Wing and ordered him committed. He was carried to jail. The detectives on both sides of the case then hunted up the boy who had brought the note. He proved to be the son of "Rubberboot" Higgins, a village ne'er owell. The boy claimed that the note had been given to him in the woods by a man who was disguised. To Detective Order well he stated his suspicion that the unknown man was Purin

CHAPTER VI.

"NEPHEW GEORGE, HOW DID YOUR UNCLE'S PAPERS COME TO BE IN YOUR DESK?"

URING the week following the sensational appearance of that mysterious "Caleb Brett note" in the local court room the detectives on both sides of the case nearly spoiled their eyesight. They were studying chirography. Each had a photographed copy of the letter that "Rubberboot" Higgins' boy had handed up to the presiding justices. With this letter Detective Ordwell patiently compared samples of the handsiding justices. With this letter Detective Ord-well patiently compared samples of the hand-writing of Daniel Purinton. The State de-tectives were equally assiduous in striving to find some resemblance between Meander Wing's hand and the writing in the mysterious note. All the parties regretfully decided if comparison showed any resemblance either way that resemblance was too faint to carry the least weight. But they sent each his budget.

way that resemblance was too faint to carry the least weight. But they sent, each his budget, away to chosen experts in the city hoping that professional examination would reveal some hidden likenesses.

The elder Wing now more bowed, more broken, more shambling, pursued Detective Ordwell until the latter rather bridled under the constant espionage of the old man and was nettled by his constant questioning laments.

"It won't do you any good to chase me around town in this manner, Mr. Wing," said the detective. "I know it is hard for you to feel that your son is in jail. The fact that I believe in common with many other people that he is there unjustly doesn't help your feelings very much and I understand it. But I am doing all I can and really you interfere with my work and my thoughts, following me up as you do." you do.

"I suppose so, Mr. Ordwell," replied the old man resignedly and piteously. "I'll try not to bother you any more."

But the old printer couldn't remain in his office. He would stand for a while with composing stick in hand, meditatively poking with blackened finger among the dusty letters in the case and then absent-mindedly would throw back the type he had been sticking and start for the door, shambling along in his slippers. Half way down the street he would seem to recover his mind and would hurry back to the office and resume work shamefacedly.

seem to recover his mind and would hurry back to the office and resume work shamefacedly. But ere another half hour had elapsed he would again be staring from the window.

"While this thing is hangin' fire as it is," said the foreman one day, "I wouldn't try to work if I was you, Mr. Wing. It hain't right for ye to try to. Ye might lose your grip altogether and that would be mighty bad for the boy. He needs ye. Take my advice and lay right off and we'll git along in the office somehow. I'll git in another boy to help the apprentice and we'll worry along first rate till the clouds clear off."

The foreman asked the apprentice if he knew of any available boys in the village and the apprentice said that all the boys were in school prentice said that all the boys were in school except Chas. Higgins, and as for him he never went to school nowadays. Therefore one day the foreman accosted the scion of Rubberboot Higgins as he was passing the door and after a few moments' conference attached him to the mechanical staff of the Mansfield Mirror.

After the foreman had failed to induce young shine.

Higgins to go after "a round square" and had been sneeringly informed that there "was no sech thing as a type-louse," it was agreed to by the laborers in the office of the Mansield Mirror that Rubberboot Higgins' boy wasn't as green as he looked. And a not inconsiderable evidence of his shrewdness was the fact that he steadily refused to be inveigled into any office what the personality of the strenger who steadily refused to be inveigled into any office chat about the personality of the stranger who gave the mysterious note to him.

Every day or so one of the state detectives would meet the Higgins boy behind the hotel horse sheds and receive a report as to the latest doings and sayings of Wing the elder. Then the Higgins boy modestly accepted the regular half dollar tip. Detective Ordwell, working away on various suppositions regarding Daniel Purinton, was equally liberal with the Higgins boy.

In the meantime no one seemed to be extracting much real information regarding the Caleb Brett mystery.

Detective Ord well was somewhat crusty when Meander Wing timidly accosted him one day asking if anything had "come up."

"As I told you before, Mr. Wing," said the detective, "there is nothing to do but wait for the report from the handwring expert. So far as I see the note bears no resemblance to Purinton's handwriting. But we must see what the professor has to say. There's nothing till then."

It was shortly after this conversation that old man Wing, rendered desperate by the delay and the continued suspicion resting on his son, went to the mill resolved to have a talk with Daniel Purinton. He hardly knew what he expected to achieve or what his suspicions were but he was suddenly inflamed with an old man's choler and determination to make were but he was suddenly inflamed with an old man's choler and determination to make some move.

"Daniel," said he, when the two were seated in a dark corner of the mill, away from chance callers, "I don't want ye to get mad with me but just consider that I'm an old man like yourself and that I have a boy that I think more of than I do of my own life. You and I have always been good friends and I don't believe you want to see me die in sorrow. You haven't got many more years anyway. You don't wont to see a young life ruined, do ye?"

"What are you driving at?" demanded Purinton with some asperity.

"Don't you, so help you God, know anything more about how Cale Brett stepped out?"

"If anyone else but you said that to me, Men," growled Purinton, "I'd cuff his head up to a peak and then knock the peak off. But I reelly do think that you have got kind of daffy over this bus'ness." He regarded Wing with a look wherein indignation and pity mingled. "But you hain't gainsayin' that there are about as many suspicious things against you as against my Arthur," persisted Wing. Then he stood up and his voice broke in a wail. "For God's sake, Dan, for the sake of our old friendship, if you know anything about this case that will help my poor boy out—for the sake of a poor old man, sorrowing and alone, come out like a man and tell it and let the axe fall where it may."

"I can see what ye've got in your mind, Mendell of the sake of the

it may."

"I can see what ye've got in your mind, Meander," said Purinton, "and it hain't in any way complimentary to me because I was in the mill that day waiting to get money from Squire Brett to pay my debts and because I have since paid those debts with money that came from a place that this village don't know about and because you think I might have been the one that paid the torn bill of Brett's into the Mirror office, you have kind of made up your mind that I can tell you more about the mystery. I can hardly blame you, Meander, for I know you are all worked up about the matter. But I am going to hold my temper though you know that most any other man would get up and flam you for insinuating the matter. But I am going to hold my temper though you know that most any other man would get up and flam you for insinuating the things you have.

"I have known you a long time, Wing," Purinton went on. He placed his knotted hand on the other's worn alpaca sleeve. "And you have knowed me. You never knew me to do a mean act. You never knew me to tell a lie. I swear to you now before High Heaven that I never saw Squire Brett in that mill that day, dead or alive. I never had a cent of his money. I'll tell you privately, Meander, that the money I used to pay off my debts I got of old Hen Hanson. He didn't want me to tell where I got it for he wants to dodge taxes. He gave a discount on interest if I wouldn't tell where I got it. I have given my word and I'm going to keep it even with that old skinflint, till the law drives me to open up. But I'm not going around telling to satisfy public curiosity in this village not by long shot. And I tell you only for reasons that you will understand. Now don't you believe me?"

Wing sat with his head in his hands for a long time and then he answered with a halfgroan. "Yes, Daniel, I can see that I and the others have misjudged you."

Purinton surveyed the melancholy old man with a rather satirical smile. "I can see, Meander, that ye are sort of sorry that I didn't do the thing," he said. "But I can't help that."

"Don't talk that way, Daniel, my old friend," carnet help?"

Meander, that ye are sort of sorry that I didn't do the thing," he said. "But I can't help that."

"Don't talk that way, Daniel, my old friend," expostulated Wing falteringly. "But every way I look and every thing I follow down ends in disappointment and everything is dark before me. Poor Arthur!"

There was silence for a few minutes. Purinton scraped meditatively under his broad thumb nail with a sliver. "Well," he mused aloud, "whatever was done to Cale Brett in that mill was done almighty quick. He wasn't in sight when I got there and I'm almost willing to take my oath that he wasn't on that pile of slabs, either. Of course I didn't pay especial attention when I walked past to go to the flume but if he had been there I'm willing to bet that I would have seen him. And he wasn't in the flume for I turned the water on myself."

"All dark—all dark," murmured Wing rising and making his way to the stairs. "But I still have faith that I shall yet find the man who knows about this terrible thing. And when I find that man I will drag the truth out of his throat with these two hands if I can't get it any other way."

He went shambling up the road in the sunshine.

That very afternoon the town of Mansfield was treated to a new sensation and had not the affair been in a measure linked with the Brett tragedy folks might have entirely forgotten the latter in their amazement at the newest devel-

Growing from a rumor it became bruited around the town that George Brett's "mill-hand wife" for whose sake most of his present troubles has been incurred—that wife had eloped with Pearson the flashy young correspondent who had been in town for weeks representing a New York paper.

The flirtation had been marked by the busy-bodies but no one had anticipated such a bodies but no one had anticipated such a screaming sensation as an elopement. The couple had left town so unobtrusively that no one had noticed their departure. But the people of Mansfield Corner were speedily aware that George Brett was engaged in a wild debauch, evidently endeavoring to drown some sort of sorrow and after a time George himself, tottering beside the bar in the hotel, profanely admitted that his wife had flown. He declared that he had told her to go—had driven her from him. But in the next breath he talked vaguely of plots and blackmailing operations and threatened vengeance as soon "as things got cleared up some." He talked long and vehemently along this line to his associates until some of the sharper among them began to wonder what could be behind all his mysterious explosions.

It furthermore became known that young Brett had borrowed at usurious rates, banking on his future, several thousand dollars, and it was hinted that this sum had been turned over to the erring Mrs. Brett just before she left town. It was certain that she had called at the local bank and changed one of the large bills that her husband had a few hours previously taken from the same bank on the money-lender's check.

Please Tell Me

Who Needs My Book.

Detective Ordwell, hearing of these matters, put in a long evening pondering on what it might mean. What had induced George Brett might mean. What had induced George Brett to further distress himself financially in order to give funds to a woman who was about leaving him? The next day the detective went over to the Corner. George Brett, so announced the landlord of the hotel where Brett and his wife had made their homesince their marriage, had gone to his camp in the woods on a fishing trip.

while had made them home woods on a fishing trip.

"Poor George isn't feeling much like 'tendin' to bus'ness these days," said the landlord sympathetically.

"No, I suppose not," assented the detective.
"Came on him rather sudden, I fancy."

"Wal, he came in one afternoon and found his wife and that newspaper snipe goin' over his private papers and the thing kind of come to a head right then and there."

"Well, I must say he treated her squarely," said the detective. "Not many men under circumstances like that would have turned around and given a woman a nice little pot of money."

The landlord looked at the detective with a rather prolonged and chilly stare. "Mebbe the people of this village think that George Brett hain't been showin' much grit in this thing," he said.

I don't know about that," said Ordwell.

he said.

"I don't know about that," said Ordwell.

"But it seemed strange to me that he didn't turn her right out without a cent—a woman who would betray him in that fashion."

"George Brett hain't tellin' all his bus'ness to the people of Mansfield," said the landlord.

"Nor to officers, either. He has his friends to confide in and advise him and I'm one of the friends, I can tell you that. Nothin' leaks through me, but I can tell ye that the folks of this place don't want to judge George Brett by what they see on the outside of this thing."

The detective started to say something more but the hotel man put u! his hand and checked him with a deprecatory snap of his fingers. "I've said all I'm goin' to," he asserted. "The rest of it is George's own bus'ness and when things get around right you'll hear something drop. Not another word, or you'n I'll have trouble." The landlord stumped away into the back regions somewhere. The detective went to the window and meditatively trailed his finger in the dust of the sash.

There was no other person in the hotel office

There was no other person in the hotel office except the weasened little boy of all work who was scattering lumps of wet sawdust over the floor preparatory to sweeping.

The boy came close to him. "Hain't you that detective from over to the village?" he inquired with deep new expressed on his features.

"Yes," said Ordwell.

"I like detectives from what I've read about 'em," volunteered the boy. He pulled a ragged nickel novel from his pocket. The way I reckon it, folks ought to be willing to help detectives when detectives are such good men. Hadn't they?"

"Go ahead, my man. I'm glad to hear anything you know."

"Is that all you know, youngster?" he demanded but not bluffly.

"Well, I kind of snooped a little after that," the boy admitted, his cheeks reddening. "But I felt so sure that them two was looking over the Squire's papers that when George Brett came in from his store unexpectedly and went upstairs I followed and hid in the next room."

"You heard some things that were said, then?"

"Oh, yes,—they had an awful time jawing then?"

"Oh, yes,—they had an awful time jawing back and forth. I can't remember half of it. But the idea was George was twitting the reporter with stealing his wife and sneaking after his private property in his desk and he allowed that the wife had told the reporter the things were there. The reporter bluffed him right back and said that the man who had the Squire's private papers in his desk was most likely the man that killed him and that now he should print the story in the paper. George likely the man that killed him and that now he should print the story in the paper. George swore like a maniac and said that the papers had come into hands by mystery and he didn't know anything about how he had got hold of them. The reporter asked him sassy like if he supposed any jury would believe that. Then they had a regular rough and tumble fight all over the floor and the reporter licked. It was awful."

"Did the reporter carry the papers away—do you know about that?" asked the detective breathlessly.

"I like detectives from what I've read about lem". "Outsidered the boy. He pulled a ragged nickel novel from his pocket. And Pearson gave me a quarter to get a chisel. I reckon that s what he used to break George Brett's desk open with." "Ahal Go on." "Then when I brought up the ice water Mrs. Brett and Pearson were going over some papers and he seemed to be writing down a list of them." "I don't suppose you saw enongh to what kind of papers they were." "I'd didn't see what they were but I heard Pearson say, 'why here's even the document that the Squire's name was scissored from the name that was on the message that the boy brought into the courtroom." "S-sh!' said Mrs. Brett, 'little pitchers have big ears.' That's all they said so that I could hear but. I've been thinkin,' Mister Detective, that they were pulling over the papers that were in the Squire's wallet the day he was killed, or something."

Ordwell, seeking through so many weeks for clues, felt his head buzz at the possibilities suggested by the boy's naive hints. He began

Breads Made of Coarse Meals.

a nation the Ameri-

less bolted flours than in those which have been refined until little is left in them but starch. This is an excellent item in the nutriment of the human being but it is not enough. With the starch should be gluten and the other wholesome elements which are found in the wheat kernel. Even the bran of the wheat contains nutritive salts, and a portion of the bran—not too much—should therefore be left in the flour. in the flour.

Apart from its value as nourishment it is well to give one's family once in a while a change from the common wheat bread. Every well to give one's family once in a while a change from the common wheat bread. Every one craves variety and there are so many good quick breads to be made from the different coarse meals that it is a pity not to know more of them than most persons seem to do. There are houses where one sees hardly anything but wheat bread on the table from one end of the year to the other. There may be muffins, there are pretty sure to be quick biscuit and once in a while raised biscuit, while griddle cakes are often taken as a matter of course. But always they are made of bolted wheat flour.

One of the best kinds of flour to introduce into our kitchens is the whole wheat flour. There are different makes of this, but there is one mill in New England which turns out especially delightful flour and I take pleasure in giving a recipe for loaf bread to be made from this. I ate it first at a farmhouse up in the Berkshire hills, and I do not think it would taste quite so good to me anywhere else. But it can be made in other kitchens and can hardly fail to give gratification anywhere.

As a matter of course, every one should know taste quite so good to me anywhere else. But it can be made in other kitchens and can hardly fail to give gratification anywhere.

As a matter of course, every one should know how to make corn bread or Johnny cake. But from what I have seen in some places offered as corn bread or corn muffins, I do not wonder that it is not more popular. The corn muffins for which I give a recipe can hardly fail to please every one except a very unreasonable somebody, who would not be pleased with anything. Rye meal used to be well known in New England and the compound of "rye and Injun" bread is frequently met in the books of some years ago,—Mrs. Stowe's especially,—that treat of old times in Massachusetts and Connecticut. Perhaps it is still found on some farmsteads there and further North, but I have never happened to meet it. The nearest approach to it is in the "Boston brown bread" which has won a place of its own in Yankeeland and outside of it.

There are many things besides loaf bread to be made from the whole wheat flour and plenty besides corn bread that corn meal will make.

besides corn bread that corn meal will make. The muffins and biscuit and gems of whole wheat and Graham flour are better, to my mind, wheat and Graham flour are better, to my mind, than those made of white flour and the griddle cakes and flapjacks and loaf corn bread that may be made of Indian meal are worthy of all praise. Akin to these are the gems and muffins and pancakes made of hominy,—a form of the maize that is too little known and appreciated. Oatmeal, too, has its value in making breads, or at least in making a part in them, when mixed with other flour.

Such breads as these are especially valuable

Such breads as these are especially valuable for growing children. Bread made of the coarse meals are more easily digested than those composed only of the fine, much bolted flour, and the salts and nutriment they contain are of benefit to the boys and girls who are making bone and muscle as well as flesh. Some of the breads are of particular use for children suffer-ing from constipation. Graham bread, in-deed, is in some cases almost too laxative and a regular diet of corn bread will often relieve chronic constipation. In hot weather it is sometimes found a trifle too heating, but that is an objection that cannot be brought against

There are certain persons who object strenuously to any change and do not care to eat anything new. But even they are sometimes open to conviction and they should at least have the chance to try whether or not they will like the bread made of other than the bolted flour.

WHOLE WHEAT LOAF BREAD. Mix two teaspoonfuls of baking powder with two quarts of sour milk, put with it two-thirds WHOLE WHEAT BISCUIT.

Into a pint of whole wheat flour stir a teaspoonful of salt and a heaping teaspoonful of baking powder and chop into it a tablespoonful of mixed cottolene and butter. When the shortening is chopped fine, add to the mixture enough sour milk or cream to make a soft dough. It should be as soft as it can be handled. Turn it out on a floured board, roll it into a sheet about half an inch thick and cut into rounds. Bake in a floured pan.

WHOLE WHEAT WAFERS.

into rounds. Bake in a floured pan.

WHOLE WHEAT WAFERS.

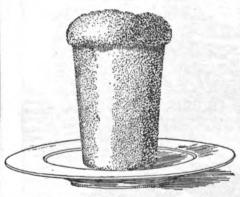

Into a cup of cream, to which you have added three tablespoonfuls of white sugar and a salt-spoonful of salt, stir enough whole wheat flour to make a rather stiff dough. Roll this out into a sheet less than quarter of an inch thick and cut rounds from it with a biscuit cutter. Roll each of these out until no thicker than paper and bake in a floured pan in a quick oven. Keep in a tin box so that they will remain crisp. These are very nice with tea.

WHOLE WHEAT GEMS. WHOLE WHEAT GEMS.
Beat three eggs light and add to them three cups warm milk, a tablespoonful of white sugar and a teaspoonful of salt. Beat in enough whole wheat flour to make a good batter, and at the last put in a tablespoonful of melted butter. Have gem pans ready heated and turn the batter into these. Bake in a very hot oven and eat at once.

EXCELSIOR CORN MUFFINS.

Beat two eggs light, stir into them a cup of milk, a tablespoonful melted butter and four tablespoonfuls white sugar. Sift a heaping teaspoonful of baking powder into a cup of white flour and a cup of corn meal, mixed. Add to this a saltspoonful of salt and stir the flour and meal into the liquid ingredients. Beat well, turn into greased muffin tins and bake.

STEAMED CORN BREAD. Mix two cupfuls corn meal with one of white flour and sift with them a scant teaspoonful of soda, a teaspoonful of salt and two tablespoon-fuls of white sugar. Melt a heaping tablespoonful of cottolene or lard and put it into two cupfuls of sour milk or buttermilk. Pour this on the prepared flour and meal, and beat very hard for about five minutes. Have ready a Boston brown bread mould very well greased and put the batter into this. Fit on a tight top and set the mould in a kettle of hot water. Be careful that it does not turn over and that the water does not get over the top of the mould. Boil steadily for two hours. Take it from the mould and set it in the oven for five or ten minutes to dry off. Eat while hot.

CORN-MEAL MUSH MUFFINS.

CORN-MEAL MUSH MUFFINS. Make a mush by stirring a cupful of salted corn meal into two cupfuls of boiling milk. Cook this in a double boiler for two hours, stirring often, that it may not lump. Take the mush from the fire, beat in a heaping table-spoonful of butter, and when this is melted set the mush aside to cool. While it is only set the mush aside to cool. While it is only lukewarm thin it with a cupful of cold milk and when it is stirred smooth whip in three beaten eggs and a third of a cupful of whole wheat flour. Add a teaspoonful of baking powder, beat until you are sure it is well mixed in and bake in muffin tins.

CORN MEAL GRIDDLE CAKES.

Into two cupfuls of corn meal which has been scalded with a quart of boiling milk, beat, when lukewarm, a tablespoonful of molasses, one of lard or cottolene, a teaspoonful of salt and two eggs, whipped light. Add half a cupful of flour, into which has been sifted a scant teaspoonful of baking powder, and thin with milk to the consistency of ordinary griddle cake batter. Bake, if possible, on a soapstone griddle.

HOMINY MUFFINS.
Beat a tablespoonful of lard and one of butbeat a tablespoontul of lard and one of butter into a cuptul of boiled hominy,—the shell hominy. Stir in a teaspoonful of salt and two tablespoonfuls of white sugar and three beaten eggs. When these are well blended put in a cup and a half of milk and lastly, half a cupful of wheat flour into which has been sifted a heaping teaspoonful of baking powder. Bake

Answers to Correspondents.

Mrs. A. W. P. I. Parker, Idaho.—I take pleasure in answering the questions you send. 1. Pot cheese is sometimes known as cottage cheese and the Germans call it, or something very like it, Schmierkause. It is made of thick sour milk. This is heated slowly until the whey separates from the curds. The latter are then put in a thin cloth stretched across an open vessel of some sort, and allowed to drain. They are then chopped and worked smooth with a little butter, cream and salt.

2. Paprika is the Hungarian red pepper. It is not so hot as the cayenne and is nice to use in seasoning. It is sold in tin boxes like mustard or spice. Answers to Correspondents.

seasoning. It is sold in tin boxes like mustard or spice.

3. Parmesan cheese is an Italian cheese, which is sold grated in bottles. It is good to put with macaroni, but when you cannot get it other grated cheese may be used in its place.

4. There are several varieties of salad oil and much that is sold under that name is cotton seed oil, with a little olive oil to flavor it. The Italian salad oil is really no better than the French, although some persons prefer it. It is a matter of taste. I am told there is a good American olive oil on the market.

5. Tarragon vinegar is vinegar in which the herb tarragon has been steeped long enough to flavor the vinegar.

the vinegar.

6. To marinate is to lay the meat or fish to be thus treated for a short time in a mixture of oil and salt or of vinegar and salt, with such seasoning as the recipe indicates. It gives fish the flavor of the marinate mixture, and will sometimes make meat tender as well as season it.

of the marinate mixture, and will sometimes make meat tender as well as season it.

K. B., New Bedford, Ohio.—I would be glad to give the recipe for the cakes if you will tell me more clearly what they are. Your description might apply to a dozen different kinds. What have they inside? Are they plain, or with fruit or other addition?

For chicken filling work a tablespoonful of butter into a cup of fine bread crumbs, season with sweet herbs,—sweet marjoram, summer savory and thyme,—and add pepper and salt at discretion. Never put any water with your stuffing or moisten it in any way expect with the melted butter.

Miss E. E., South Germantown, Wis.—I am sorry your query did not reach me earlier. By the time this appears it would be too late for the recipe you wish to do you any good this year. Remind me of it early next season and I will give it with pleasure.

Mrs. L. C. L., Irene, S. D.—Shampoo the. children's heads with bi-chloride of mercury soap and dry the hair. Then every night, at bed-time, wash the heads with tincture of larkspur and brush the hair well. This is a sure cure. At the end of a week you will have no more trouble. The preparation is a deadly poison, taken internally, but will do no harm applied externally.

Mrs. I. H. H. Barstow, Texas.—I am much obliged for the recipes you send and take pleasure in add-ing them below:

ing them below:

LEMON PIE.

Yolks of 4 eggs, 1 cup sugar, 1 tablespoon butter, 1 and 1-2 pints sweet milk, 1 pint corn bread crumbs. Grated rind and piece of one lemon. When well done spread over the top the whites of the eggs whipped to a stiff froth sweetened with one cup of sugar. Then set in the oven to brown slightly.

PICCALLLY.

2 doz. large cucumbers chopped, 1 doz. green peppers chopped, 1-4 doz. ripe peppers chopped, 1 large head cabbage chopped, 1 peck green tomatoes chopped, 1-2 gallon of onions chopped, 1 pint of salt sprinkled over this; let stand 1 hour, then put in sack and hang up to drip over night.

Put in a kettle 1 gal. vinegar, 1 pt. brown sugar, 1-4 lb. mustard, 1-2 oz. cinnamon, 1 tablespoonful each of mace, allspice, celery seed, and a little horseradish. Cook mess slowly two hours, add mustard last as it thickens it and it is apt to burn. Kraut can be substituted for cabbage.

Rosa M.—Chop one tablespoonful of butter and Rosa M.—Chop one tablespoonful of butter and lard mixed with one quart of flour, first sifting into this two heaping teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Make a hole in the middle of this and stir in milk enough to make a soft dough. Begin with two cups and let the milk be new and rich if possible. Have the dough as soft as can be handled. Roll into a sheet about half an inch thick, cut into rounds with a biscuit-cutter and bake in a floured pan.

Baking powder is used in the place of cream tartar and soda mixed, and has the same effect as these. The recipe for gems will be given with directions for bread made of other coarse meals in an early issue of this paper.

Fly specks, if new, can sometimes be wiped from frames and furniture with a damp cloth. When they are old, they may have to be scraped off and the spots left retouched. Try equal parts of vinegar and water for the fly specked furniture.

CHAPTER I.

CHAPTER I.

HE September sun was setting stormily down there on the coast. A lonely scene and hour. Away to the east, the fishing village of Clontarf nestled under the rocks; to the left, the tall Tudor turrets and peaked gables, rising above the trees of the park, Clontarf Castle reared its hoary head—one of the stateliest and oldest houses in Britain. The only moving things on darkening earth and storm-tossed sea were a girl and a yacht.

The girl stood gazing seaward, making a picture of herself, outlined against the blackening gloaming—a brightly pretty girl, very fair, very youthful, with a thoroughly Irish face. A face for an artist, standing there in vivid relief against black sky and dark sea, the brown hair and picturesque red cloak streaming in the rising wind.

The yacht lay a mile away, a picture in its way, as well as the girl. In golden letters on the stern was the name, "Nora Creina."

The girl looked impatiently at the darkening sky, at the heaving vessel, then glanced behind her with a little, petulant frown.

"How long he is!" she said. "They expected Mr. Gerald this evening, but I don't see why that should keep him. Ah!"

She stopped suddenly, her pretty, sunburned face brightening; for a boat was lowered from the "Nora Creina," and two men rowed rapidly shoreward.

"He will come, then, after all!" she cried in

"He will come, then, after all!" she cried in a joyful, breathless sort of way.

A step came rapidly down the rocky path and

A step came rapidly down the rocky path and a rich, melodious voice rang down the stillness, singing a ringing hunting song.

"A southerly wind and a cloudy sky proclaim it a hunting morning!" chanted the full, rich voice; and then the singer came into view, and stood balancing himself in mid-air, on the topmost peak of a lofty crag, twenty feet over the water.

on the topmost peak of a lofty crag, twenty feet over the water.

He was a tall young man—nay, youth—of scarce one-and-twenty, a "six-foot son of Anak," lithe and long of limb, straight as an arrow, broad-shouldered, deep-chested, goldenhaired and azure-eyed. A magnificent young giant—the wildest dare-devil in the three kingdoms, a mad-headed, hot-brained, reckless young ne'er-do-well, who yet looked at you with eyes as blue and smiling and innocent as the eyes of a month-old babe. He was dressed in the colors of his first and only love—the idol of his heart—his graceful "Nora Creina," there afloat on the waters—white trousers, green jacket, green cap with a gold band set jauntily on his handsome, goldenhead. He stood poised on the dizzy peak, looking seaward with brilliant, cloudless blue eyes.

eyes.

"There you are, my beauty, my darling!" he cried, apostrophizing the trim little bark.

"And if I don't give you a spanking run in the teeth of this gale before morning, I'm not my father's son. We'll make King's Head in four hours, with this stiff breeze. A glorious race before midnight, my darling 'Nora'!"

"'Oh, my Nora Creina, dear,
My charming, bashful Nora Creina!
Beauty lies in many eyes,
But love in yours, my Nora Creina!"

He sung gayly, his voice floating out on the

But love in yours, my Nora Creina!"

He sung gayly, his voice floating out on the breeze to the boat, dancing like the cockleshell it was over the breakers, and answered by the men on board with a hearty Irish cheer. "Lord Rory!"

He had turned to leap down, agile as a cat, never seeing the red cloak and the pretty face so near him, when the girl, starting up, called; and as he turned with a bewildered "Halloo!" called again:

"Lord Roderick!"

"Fore George, it's Kathleen!" He was beside her with a bound. "Standing here like a Wicklow fairy, or a banshee, or a goddess of the storm, or anything else you like. Come to see me off, Kathleen? How polite of you!"

Kathleen tossed her pretty head saucily. She had come to see him off, and colored guiltily as he guessed it.

Kathleen tossed her pretty head saucily. She had come to see him off, and colored guiltily as he guessed it.

"You always were conceited, Lord Rory, and always will be. As if one could not come down to watch the storm rise without coming on your account!"

"Watch the storm rise? By Jove! how romantic the dear little girl's getting! Has quite a Byronic sound, that, 'pon my word, and comes of improving her mind, under my tuition, as she's been doing lately."

He looked a dangerous preceptor for youth, with his laughling eyes and splendid face; and the red light flashed gloriously up in the pretty, sunburned cheeks under his merry gaze.

"So you're going to King's Head tonight, my lord," Kathleen said, making a petulant little mouth. "Well, I dare say, you'll be safe in spite of the storm. 'Any one born to be hanged—' You know the proverb."

"'Hanged, will never be drowned.' Very likely, Miss O'Neal. I won't be the first Desmond who has been hanged for his country's benefit, either, by long odds. We always do come to grief as a rule, and I don't think half a dozen of us ever died decently in our beds. We've been roasted alive in our own strongholds, we've been court-martialed and shot at day-dawn, we've had our heads chopped off like spring chickens, and we've been hanged,

Was he going to shirk it now, and a woman was he going to shirk it now, and a woman was he going to shirk it now, and a woman was he going to shirk it now, and a woman was he going to shirk it now, and a woman was he going to shirk it now, and a woman was he going to shirk it now, and a woman was he going to shirk it now, and a woman was he going to shirk it now, and a woman was he going to shirk it now, and a woman was he going to shirk it now, and a woman was he going to shirk it now, and a woman was he going to shirk it now, and a woman was he going to shirk it now, and a woman was he going to shirk it now, and a woman was he going to shirk it now, and a woman was he going to shirk it now, and a woman was he going to shirk it now, and a woma we've been roasted anve in our own strong-holds, we've been court-martialed and shot at day-dawn, we've had our heads chopped off tike spring chickens, and we've been hanged, drawn, and quartered by the dozen for high treason. I never heard of but one Desmond who was drowned, and he was a pirate, so could expect no better. Yes, Miss Kathleen O'Neal, I'm off for King's Head in my bonny 'Nora Creina,' and I'll take you with me, it you choose, with all the pleasure in life."

"Thank you, Lord Rory! I'm not tired of my life yet. When I feel like suicide, I'll let you know. There's the boat. Good evening to you. I'm going home."

"My boat is on the shore, and my bark is on the sea.' And so you won't come? Well, then, I would recommend you to go home, for standing here in the wind is neither pleasant nor profitable, that I can see. Good-night, Kathleen. If quite convenient, dream of me. Oh! I say, how's the Englishman?"

The girl turned upon him suddenly, her face

The girl turned upon him suddenly, her face reddening, her eyes flashing passionately in the half-light.

"Lord Rory!" she cried. He laughed, bounding like a chamois down

He laughed, bounding like a chamois down the steep crags.

"Then you won't smile on your lover? Poor fellow! how I pity him! My own heart has been broken so often, you see, Kathleen, that I can afford to sympathize with fellow-martyrs. Any messages for King's Head? No? Then, for the second time, good night."

He waved his gold-banded cap courteously in gay salute, this boyish Lord Roderick Desmond, only son of the Earl of Clontarf, and went springing down to the shore, singing again:

again:

'Twas from Kathleen's eyes he flew-Eyes of most unholy blue!'" Eyes of most unholy blue!"

But for the Kathleen standing on the rocks, she was forgotten ere the passionate, yearning blue eyes were fairly out of his sight.

He sprang into the boat, the men pushed off, and it went dancing lightly over the billows.

And then distance and darkness took him, and Kathleen hid her hot face in her hands, loving, and knowing she loved, as vainly and wildly as that other Kathleen, of whose unholy blue eyes Moore sings, hurled into the lake by flinty-hearted Saint Kevin.

Vainly, indeed, for she was only the daughter of the village pedagogue, and he, ah! the blue blood of the princely Desmonds—kings of old—flowed in his veins, and an earl's coronet awaited him in the future. awaited him in the future.

Night had fallen—black, starless, wild. And through the night and the storm the gallant little "Nora Creina" shot ahead like an arrow, and on her deck, Lord Roderick Desmond stood, scanning the stormy blackness with a powerful night-glass powerful night-glass the oars, and sent the light skiff shooting to where their white faces gleamed above the hissing waves. Lord Roderick bent over and laid hold of the woman's long, streaming hair. Breathlessly the watchers on board the yacht gazed. There was a moment of inexpressible peril and suspense; then the woman was lifted in the stalwart young arms of Lord Clontarf's son and laid in the bottom of the boat.

But that moment was fatal. The white face of the man vanished, as a huge wave dashed him brutally into its depths. Over the wild, midnight sea one last agonized cry rang out: "Oh, God, save me! save my lnez!" "Back to the yacht, Fitzgerald—back, for our lives!" Lord Roderick shouted. "The man has perished! Back! Give me the oars!" The little boat, urged by those strong, skilled rowers, shot back to the "Nora Creina" as if invisible hands guided it through the tempestuous sea.

They reached the yacht, and a great shout of joy and thankfulness rose as the young heroes passed up the rescued woman and came on board.

The burning ship blazed steadily to the water's edge, then went headlong down, and an awful blackness reigned.

Of all her living crew only this one woman remained to tell the tale.

She lay on the deck where they had placed her, still as one dead. Lord Roderick lifted her in his arms, carried her into the lamplit cabin, and laid her upon a couch.

She was dripping wet, and her hair, long as a mermaid's, clung about her. Her eyes were closed, the face was marble white. Cold and still she lay there before him in a dead swoon.

And the young Lord Roderick stood above her, a brandy-flask in his hand, gazing down on that white, still face. For, in all the one-and-twenty years of his bright, brief life, Earl Clontart's only son had never looked on anything half so lovely as this unknown girl he had saved from death.

Was he going to shirk it now, and a woman perishing before his eyes? His wild cheer, clear as a bugle blast, echoed cheerily as he sprung into the frail skiff.

"You will come with me, Fitzgerald," he said. "No, my lads; any more of you will be in the way. Now, then, pull with a will."

And the bark sped away over the foamy breakers, as though upheld by fairy hands. The "luck of the Desmonds," traditionary all the country-side over, was with them in their dauntless daring tonight.

"Leap into the sea!" those on board the yacht heard Lord Roderick cry; "we will pick you up. We can go no nearer."

The man on the deck of the burning vessel seized the woman in his arms, and, ere the words were well uttered, leaped overboard into the black, bitter waters. The flaming ship lighted up the storm-lashed ocean for yards around.

Far away white sails shone in the offing, and rising and falling airily in its sheltered cove the "Nora Creina" lay at anchor.

Kathleen had sunk down on a bed of seamoss, half lying, half sitting, one round white arm thrown up over a tall rock, her head lying wearily on that arm.

The great, soft blue eyes, so brilliant, so joyous six weeks before, looked blankly over the ocean, with a dull and dreary loneliness inexpressibly sad to see. The pretty, piquant face had lost all its bright bloom, its glad gay smiles and dimples and dimples.

THE VALUE OF CHARCOAL.

Few People Know How Useful it is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

taken into the human system for the came cleansing purpose.
Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better; it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines and carries them out of the system.
Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking or after eating onions and other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking or after eating onions and other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion, it whitens the teeth and further acts as a natural and eminently safe cathartic. It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh. All druggists sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics in tablet form or rather in the form of large, pleasant tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood, and the beauty of it is that no possible harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary, great benefit.

A Buffalo physician in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefitted by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation, yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

The Late Bloomers.

The Late Bloomers.

N most collections, there are few plants that can be depended on to give flowers after the first of October. The frosts which characterize the mid-autumnal season have killed the Dahlias, and the Cosmos shows a mass of blackened foliage, and only a stray Pansy or a belated Petunia makes an effort to brighten up the garden. But this dearth of flowers need not be if we are willing to take a little forethought, and plant something that can be depended on to bloom after other flowers have vanished. There are late-flowering plants that will prolong the season of bloom up to the very edge of winter. Why not have them in our garden?

Among the shrubs, there is Hydrangea paniculata grandiffora. Nearly all gardens have a specimen of it, but the beauty of the plant is never fully understood until it is seen growing in groups. Plant from four to eight in a mass, and keep them pruned so that the plants on the outside of the group have low, spreading branches that bring the foliage well down to the ground, and you have something that will indeed be an ornament to your garden. Each spring go over the shrubs and cut them back at least one-third. Then manure the soil well about them. This is all you need do. The bushes will look out for themselves after that, and during the late fall months they will be to the garden what the Snowball is to the spring season. Well-grown plants are almost solid masses of ivory-white flowers, which take on a pink-and-greenish tinge after a little, finally changing to a brown which is not at all unpleasant. This plant is as hardy as it is possible for a plant to be, a rapid grower, and one that can easily be procured in almost any country neighborhood. It can be planted in fall or spring.

The native Aster is one of our best late fall flowers. It is readily domesticated. Cultivation makes a very different thing of it from the dwarfed, ill-shapen plants we see growing in pastures and fence-corners, where cattle have broused on it, or broken it down. It soon becomes strong and v

HARDY ASTERS.

Among all of the desirable ones, I do not think

Among all of the desirable ones, I do not think of any quite so desirable as the Aster.

A good companion for it is the late-flowering Golden Rod. Plant these old friends of highway and hillside together, and they will give you a contrast of color that will delight you with its harmony. Like the Aster, the Golden Rod grows to large size under domestication, and the little root you plant this year will have grown into a great clump in three or four years' time. Don't despise the plants because they are "common." Beauty is beauty, under all conditions, and the "common" flowers are often those which give the most satisfaction. Indeed, they are the ones for the amateur to depend on, for their robust, sturdy vitality admirably adapts them to the uses of those who are quite likely to fail with plants which demand careful treatment. demand careful treatment.

Two Late Flowering Annuals.

Among the annuals which linger after the Among the annuals which linger after the frosts come, the Aster stands at the head because of its striking and meritorious qualities. That it is a most beautiful flower no one can deny who has seen it growing well. Its wide range of color makes it almost as showy as the Chrysanthemum, and no Chrysanthemum excels it in beauty of form or profusion of bloom. Indeed, of late years, it has become a rather formidable rival of that popular flower, and many are palmed off upon unsuspecting persons for "Mums" of the choicest kind! Some varieties so closely resemble those flowers that the imposition is an easy one to carry through without detection. The Branching Aster, and the Comet varieties are tall and that the imposition is an easy one to carry through without detection. The Branching Aster, and the Comet varieties are tall and stately plants, with flowers borne on such long stalks that decorators find them vastly more effective than the best Chrysanthemums for ornamental work on a large scale. And they last better than any other flower I know of. Change the water in which they are placed every day, cutting off a bit from the end of each stem in order to expose fresh tissue to the action of the water, and you can keep them looking well for ten days or two weeks.

Ten weeks' stock.—The "Gilly flower" of our grandmothers' day is a plant which used to be seen in every country garden, but of late, like many others of the dear "old-fashioned" flowers, it has been sadly neglected. But the revival of interest in these good old flowers, among those who appreciate real merit, promises to bring it to the front again. There is where it belongs. A plant that has such beautiful and fragrant flowers as this has, and branches to hold them in place. The soil about them must be perfectly drained, as water will kill them if it stands on the surface. Before putting on the leaves, bend the bushes down and cover with three or four inches of sandy soil.

W.S. M.—Shrubs can be transplanted safely in the fall. It can be done any time after the ripening of their foliage. If not done until late in the season, disturb their roots as little as possible. Have the soil in which you set them very mellow so that it can be worked in firmly, about their roots.

Mrs. P. M.—The only really satisfactory winter flowering Fuchsia is the variety called Speciosa. All the others should go into the cellar over winter.

ter.

Amateur.—Your Tuberous Begonias can be left in the pots in which they grew during the summer, or you can pick the tubers out of the soil, wrap them in paper, and keep them in a room where they will be cool, but safe from frost. If you leave them in their pots, simply without water until the soil is dry then set them away in a corner where frost cannot reach them. A cupboard is a good place for them. Gloxinias should receive the same treatment.

GROUP OF HYDRANGEA PANICULATA GRANDIFLORA.

which bears them bravely and cheerfully when the early snows whiten the garden beds in which they grow, ought never to be neglected. In October, it will be necessary to take some of the recently-potted plants into the house. When this is done be careful to keep them away from fire-heat. If you expose them to a high temperature, they will make a rapid, weak growth, which will lower their vitality to such an extent that they will not be likely to recover from it in all winter. Therefore, keep them, if possible, in a temperature that does not go above sixty-five degrees and admit all the fresh air you can. This is trite advice, perhaps, but it is advice that must be given often, in order to fully impress upon the amateur the great importance of it.

Watering must be regulated to suit the needs of the plants, at this season. Those which are not growing freely will require but little, as evaporation will take place slowly. Keep in mind the good old rule—Let the surface of the soil look dry before more is given. It doesn't matter whether it takes one day, or several, to bring this about. Let the looks of the soil govern you.

On no account should fertilizers be given to soil look dry before more is given. It doesn't matter whether it takes one day, or several, to bring this about. Let the looks of the soil govern you.

On no account should fertilizers be given to plants not making active growth. Dormant plants not only do not need a fertilizer, but they cannot make use of one if it is given. The application of it is a positive injury at such a time because it unnaturally excites the plant which ought to be kept as quiet as possible until it is ready to go to work. Fertilizers are for plants that can assimilate strong food. A plant entirely at rest requires no food at all. Be ever on the lookout for insects. These breed rapidly under the conditions which prevail in the house at this season. In a warm, dry atmosphere the red spider will do a great deal of injury in a very short time. There is only one way in which to keep him within bounds, and that is by the liberal use of water. Shower your plants all over, daily, taking particular pains to see that the water gets to the underside of the leaves. Keep vessels of it on stove or register, that evaporation may be constantly taking place. The more moisture you communicate to the air the better your plants will grow. If the aphis puts in an appearance, as he very likely will, make prompt and energetic use of the Ivory soap infusion heretofore advised. It is easier to keep your plants from becoming infested by insects than it is to rid them after they have been allowed to take possession. Act on the offensive, rather than the defensive. Assume that they will surely come if you do not head them off, and do all you can to make it so unpleasant for them that they will not care to take up their abode in your window-garden. "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure."

Answers to Correspondents.

Mrs. W. F.—Rose Geraniums require larger pots than the flowering Geraniums, because they are grown for their foliage, and in order to have fine foliage it is necessary to encourage vigorous development of branches. Give rich soil and plenty of root-room.

CHRYSANTHEMUM-FLOWERED ASTER.

Elsie B.—Tea Roses are often wintered at the north, in the garden, but in order to bring them through safely they must have the very best of protection. The ideal covering is one of leaves, six or eight inches deep, with wire netting or evergreen

Fannie S. W.—It is an easy matter to grow plants well in hanging pots or baskets, just as easy as it is to grow them well on the window sill. All you need to do is to make sure that they get all the water they need. Nine out of ten hanging pots that die, fail because they do not get half water enough. Being exposed on all sides, and in a stratum of air of higher temperature than that at the sill, evaporation takes place rapidly, and this must be provided for by frequent and liberal applications of water.

Mrs. H. T.—Bulbs for winter flowering can be potted this month. Give them a rich soil, after potting them, water well, then set in a cool dark place to form roots. Leave them there until you are sure they are well rooted. It generally takes them six weeks or two months to do this part of the work. A cellar is a good place for them or an old shed, if they can be kept from freezing. The most satisfactory plants for forcing are single Tulips, Hyacinths, (both Holland and Roman,) Bermuda Lilies, and Daffodils.

Mrs. S. W. W.—The best way to get Perennial Phlox from seed is to sow that seed as soon as ripe, in the beds among the old plants. If this is done, you will have all the seedlings you care for, but if you gather the seed and keep it over until spring, you will not be likely to get many plants from it. Seedlings can never be depended on to give flowers like those of the parent varieties. You may get some fine varieties from them, and you may not. You have to take the chances if you increase your stock in this manner. If you want any particular variety you must obtain it by division of the root, or from the florist, who propagates choice varieties in the same manner.

Mrs. L. L. D.—The following are all good plants for use in hanging baskets: Moneywort, Othonna, Mrs. L. L. D.—The following are all good plants for use in hanging baskets: Moneywort, Othonna, Tradescantia, Oxalis, Linuria, Sweet Allysum, and Lobelia. To succeed with them, be sure that the soil never gets dry. This is very important. Nine out of ten failures that occur might have been avoided if more water had been used. Because of being exposed on all sides, and occupying a higher stratum of air than those on the window sill, hanging plants lose a great deal of moisture from evaporation. It is a good plan to dip each plant in a pailful of water and leave it there until it has soaked in all the water it can retain.

Amateur.—Worms in the soil of pot-plants can be driven out or killed by the use of lime water—a piece of perfectly fresh lime as large as a coffeeup dissolved in a pailful of water. Apply enough to each plant to thoroughly saturate all the soil in the pot. Smaller applications are worthless. If one does not remedy the difficulty, repeat the operation. No injury will be done to your plants, as water can hold only a certain amount of lime in suspension—never enough to harm any plant.

nary varieties soon become in intensely hot rooms.

Mrs. D. E. R.—I would advise you to put your old Oleander in the garden next spring. There it will be likely to bloom throughout the season, and give you agreat deal of pleasure while you are growing a new one to take its place. If you have room in the cellar for the old plant, do not leave it out to be killed by the winter, but take it up before cold weather comes, crowd its roots into a box, and set it away until spring. I have carried over old plants several years in succession in this way. Each spring, when I planted them out, I cut away a good deal of the old top. New branches soon came to take the place of those removed, and by the middle of summer the plant had renewed itself, and during the latter part of the season it was covered with flowers. We have no shrub that can equal the Oleander in beauty, and it is well worth while to take care of the old plants, year after year, for summer use in the garden.

N. S. F.—You ask if I consider a Geranium more-

N.S. F.—You ask if I consider a Geranium more than a year old worth anything. Yes, I do. For use in the house, in winter, a year-old plant is worth several times as such as a young plant, because it will have more branches, and the more branches there are the greater the amount of flowering surface. I am well aware that many persons advise discarding Geraniums after they are a year old, but this advice is given because the parties giving it have never tried an old plant properly. If you want a Geranium for winter-flowering, you must not allow it to bloom during the summer. Take one of these old plants—it does not matter if it is two, three, or four years old—cut it back sharply in spring, so that there will be nothing left of it but a mass of stubs instead of branches, re-pot it into a soil of moderate richness, keep it in a pot during the summer, water only sufficiently to keep the soil moist, and pick off every bud that appears. By fall you will have a plant ready to make vigorous growth as soon as you give it encouragement to do so by fertilizing it and giving more water. By the beginning of the year it will be a mass of young growth, and from that time on to spring it will produce flowers constantly, and in great profusion, while a young plant, started in spring from a cutting, will have but two or three branches, and can, of course, give but few flowers, as there can never be more than one cluster at a time on the same branch. Those who give old plants a good trial will never willingly thereafter make use of young plants for winter flowering. I have specimens of Geraniums five and six years old in my greenhouse which are literally covered with flowers winter after winter, and the treatment given them is the one I have outlined above. One reason why so many are prejudiced against old plants for winter is—they have tried to make those which did duty in the garden during the summer blossom on during the winter, and in this attempt they have failed. They lost sight of the fact that few plants can blossom continually. The satisfactory winter-flowering Geranium must always be the one that has not been asked to give flowers during summer.

Bessie Burt writes that she recently made a very proty table with very little expense. A square pine table served for the foundation; over the top tack two thicknesses of double-faced, white Canton fiannel; then one thickness finished neatly with a hem, was tacked around the four sides. Now cut a square of silesia to fit the top, and cover with dotted white Swiss; box penough to escape the floor, fit it over the covered table and you will have a charming addition to your room. A great advantage in using white is, that it can be laundered frequently, and when fresh always looks as dainty as if new.

Few People Realize

The Danger in That Common Disease, Catarrh.

Because catarrhal diseases are so common and because catarrh is not rapidly fatal, people too often overlook and neglect it until some incurable ailment develops as a result of the neglect. The inflamed condition of the membrane of the nose and throat makes a fertile soil for the germs of Pneumonia and Consumption, in fact catarrhal pneumonia and catarrhal consumption are the most common forms of these dreaded diseases which annually cause more than one quarter of the deaths in this country. Remedies for catarrh are almost as numerous as catarrh sufferers but very few have any actual merit as a cure, the only good derived being simply a temporary relief.

There is, however, a very effective remedy recently discovered which is rapidly becoming famous for its great value in relieving and permanently curing all forms of catarrhal diseases, whether located in the head, throat, lungs or stomach.

This new catarrh cure is principally composed.

stomach.

This new catarrh cure is principally composed of a gum derived from the Eucolyptus tree, and this gum possesses extraordinary healing and antiseptic properties. It is taken internally in the form of a lozenge or tablet, pleasant to the taste and so harmless that little children take them with safety and benefit.

Eucolyptus oil and the bark are sometimes used but are not so convenient nor so palatable as the gum.

Eucolyptus oil and the bark are sometimes used but are not so convenient nor so palatable as the gum.

Undoubtedly the best quality is found in Stuart's Catarrh Tablets which may be found in any drug store and any catarrh sufferer who has tried douches, inhalers and liquid medicines, will be surprised at the rapid improvement after a few days' use of Stuart's Catarrh Tablets which are composed of the gum of the Eucolyptus tree, combined with the other antiseptics which destroy the germs of catarrh in the blood and expel the catarrhal poison from the system.

Dr. Ramsdell in speaking of Catarrh and its cure says: "After many experiments I have given up the idea of curing catarrh by the use of inhalers, washes, salves or liquid medicines. I have always had the best results from Stuart's Catarrh Tablets; the red gum and other valuable antiseptics contained in these tablets/make them, in my opinion, far superior to any of the numerous catarrh remedies so extensively advertised. The fact that Stuart's Catarrh Tablets are sold in drug stores, under protection of a trademark, should not prejudice conscientious physicians against them because their undoubted merit and harmless character make them a remedy which every catarrh sufferer may use with perfect safety and the prospect of a permanent cure.

For colds in the head, for coughs, catarrhal deafness and catarrh of the stomach and liver, people who have tried them say that Stuart's Catarrh Tablets are a household necessity.

Fashions for Fall.

What Women Wear @ How to Make It.

New York, October, 1902.

LTHOUGH the full fall fashions are not yet out in all their glory, there is enough in view to indicate pretty plainly that taste in dress has not reached a quieter tone than the sumings forth. Dressmakers and tailors are it have things and the stores have put mer brings forth. mer brings forth. Dressmakers and tailors are busy with new things and the stores have put away the numerous articles they had on view largely during September for school girl wear, and have substituted displays for women and children, for the little ones these days are almost as much creatures of fashion as the grown-ups.

At this season of the year when long coats At this season of the year when long coats are too warm for general wear, short reefers are quite comfortable garments for little people when the mornings and evenings are cool enough to require them. Sometimes the reefers, or short jackets, are made of pique or linen and braided, or the braid put on in rows; feather stitching is a pretty finish also, for the useful little wraps. French flannel or serge makes a nice light weight reefer without any lining, and the seams bound with narrow ribbons. These jackets are closed in front with large pearl buttons, and a cape collar extends over the shoulders. over the shoulders.

To make a reefer for a child two years old, it will take one and one-half yards of material, twenty-seven inches wide.

The new pin dotted wool goods ranks next to the new miroir velvet. The dotted wool fabrics are especially suited to the school girl; being so fine and soft, they can be made with all the numerous tuckings that are now the rage. Sometimes a plain color is used with this dotted material stitched on in hands with silk the Sometimes a plain color is used with this dotted material, stitched on in bands with silk the color of the dots; for instance, a plain navy blue ground with red dots and bands of red stitched with blue is quite an attraction, and becoming to either blonde or brunette.

Both old and young wear with grace similar styles. All the family frocks run to the blouse effects, and the skirts are all designed on the order of middle effects; that is, all the trimming runs midway between the waist line and the hem on the bottom of the skirt. Only tiny girls' skirts are trimmed directly on the bottom. Fashion says, woman is to wel-Only tiny girls' skirts are trimmed directly on the bottom. Fashion says, woman is to wel-come the colored and the tinted pongees and flannels in the form of pajamas. No more soft flowing night gowns for girls of all ages, but pajamas. These are fine for children in their infancy, but what say the dainty misses of such a fashion freak?

As the leaves begin to fall, so does the vivid fashionable color green begin to fall in enthu-

As the leaves begin to fall, so does the vivid fashionable color green begin to fall in enthusiasm. No more profuse green color for a while. When the green craze first reached New York it was almost impossible to meet the demand for green veils. But now the green spots are gently gliding from our view.

The most modest veil often matches the hat and the costume in color. White veils barred with black are worn, but to many persons they are unbecoming.

A dainty and lovely late fancy appears in the negligee costume, a pretty dressing sack and skirt to match, and the very dainty effect is what every woman will like. A suit of this kind is quite attractive made of white pongee and trimmed with the very dark Arabian lace and black velvet ribbon; the sack reaches to the waist line in the back, but comes to a point in the front; bell shaped sleeves and broad collar trimmed with the lace and the collar is fastened with a bow of black velvet ribbon. The skirt is gored but the back width is gathered a little full on to a tiny yoke, and a ruffle of lace finishes the bottom of the skirt; also the beading and velvet as a heading for the ruffle of lace.

A most useful and charming blouse for autumn wear is made of two yards of white Indian head. The fronts are stamped in any elaborate pattern and braided in coronation braid and finished with French knots of heavy thread (white, number twenty.) The cost of the braid is twenty-five cents and the two yards of Indian head will be only twenty cents, so with your time and an expenditure of fifty cents you have one of the most useful and pretty blouses. It may be worn with tailormade suit or without.

The lace mania goes on. The combination of two laces seems to lead; black and white, used together in various wars.

cente you have one of the most useful and pretty blouses. It may be worn with tailor-made suit or without.

The lace mania goes on. The combination of two laces seems to lead; black and white, used together in various ways. All-over white lace has a pretty effect when put over black, and black lace used for the finishing of the garment. Collars and cuffs of lace will be much worn on velvet. Cover the velvet collar and cuffs with either black or white lace, or both. Deep lace collars are worn. Heavy lace appliqued with cloth is used on tailor-made suits. Laces strapped with cloth will also be in vogue. Many gowns are made without trimming except a deep lace collar. Small jackets of very heavy lace, both in black and white are made and worn with many costumes, producing a pretty and dressy effect. The old-time lace sack with sleeves, worn by our ancestors will, no doubt, soon appear on some upto-date gowns of the present day. The wool laces which are dyed to match the gowns are to appear soon in the line of laces already so popular. These are also seen in white and ecru, some of them with flashes of very bright colors which make a striking trimming.

Plaid dresses for half grown girls are made on the bias with a seam down the front.

The only trimming on a young child's skirt is a row of feather-stitching above the hem, done in very heavy silk embroidery.

Plain colors in material will be much in vogue for the coming season; browns of all shades, greens, dark reds, old rose and a goodly share of blues. Flannel also is a favorite material and will be much in evidence.

A dainty frock for a two year old is made of white albathors trimmed with baby satin ribbon.

Boys' suits look best when worn with black or white leather bets bon.

Boys' suits look best when worn with black or white leather belts.

For a school girl, the best belt is one of the same material as the gown and stiffened with a belt tape ribbon.

All walking skirts and outing skirts of every kind of material are made up without linings, and the gored skirt with a wide flare at the bottom seems to be a popular one, also the plaited skirt, but in this one, in order to avoid the thickness about the hips the skirt is plaited

With great effort on the part of women, the tailor-made suit which is being turned out now with a small sweep will be over-ruled and hereafter cut short.

after cut short.

The combination of one smooth and one rough material will appear in our Fall outing and walking costumes, and the blue, brown and gray mixtures will be in vogue.

Our foreign sisters seem to have exhausted wools, silks, cottons and linens and similar material by introducing on the tailor suits soft leathers, which are found in almost any color and shade. These are used as bands, pipings, collars and cuffs, as well as belts. Some of the pipings on the sombre wool goods are in orange leather. A suit of brown wool trimmed with bands of the same goods, stitched with orange silk and pipings of orange leather and a belt of leather is a pleasing reality. It is worn with a hat of all brown. Any of the new tailor designs can be used in making this suit of brown.

Answers to Fashion Inquirers.

Mrs. Helen R., Ripley, O.—You can content yourself with the present style as there will be little change. (2) Be careful in fitting the child, see that the armholes of the dress are exactly in the right place; if placed too far front it will produce a stooped effect of the shoulders; have the back of the waist fit perfectly tight allowing much fullness in the front. It is as much the fault of the fitting of the garment as the figure of the child. (3) The night-dresses with worn out lace yokes can be made into plain white aprons and skirts for small girls. This accumulation of muslin and cambric "left-overs" will furnish many other usefuls, as night pillow cases for baby's crib, etc.

Katy Did, Ozark, Mo.—Stockings are certainly night pillow cases for baby's crib, etc.

Katy Did, Ozark, Mo.—Stockings are certainly well worth considering. If too small, they soon wear out, and if too large they injure the feet, and all new stockings should be well darned, that is run well on the wrong side in the heels and the toes before ever wearing them, and this manner of treatment insures double wear. This should be done with soft darning cotton and by all means childrens stockings should receive this treatment. Silk stockings should be darned with silk thread, yet a very pretty darning can be made with soft cotton floss the color of the stockings.

Miss Alice B. Ashland, Ky.—Lace applique is cotton floss the color of the stockings.

Miss Alice B., Ashland, Ky.—Lace applique is used more than ever as trimming; and sleeves are growing larger. (2) On a blouse for a dressy occasion the collar is the same as the trimming used on the blouse. The separate ribbon and stock are used more on the simple waists which are worn with the tailor made suits. There is a great deal of hand work on the waists of the present day; feather stitching, old time cross stitching, and many other stitches of past ages, and all can be done at home. Braiding also is in vogue and never loses its hold on fashion. The combination braids are the up-to-date trimming; for instance in a red, white and silver braid, the three being joined together by catch stitching.

Mrs. R. M., Canton, Ohio.—As to belts, they are getner by catch stitching.

Mrs. R. M., Canton, Ohio.—As to belts, they are numerous in style and any kind are worn; it all depends on the figure of the wearer; a stout person should avoid a belt of different color from her gown as it makes the waist appear shorter. Belts with wide buckles in the back are much worn and as the belt gets narrow toward the front quite a small buckle fastens it.

small buckle fastens it.

Miss Mary S., Parkersburg, Va.—A morning gown is what you need made of solid blue linen, cut in strips and put together with bands of white linen, and made in the most simple way; no trimming, using only the bands of both blue and white linen stitched together, then cut out. Use the blue for one stripe and the white for the other; this can be worn very late in the fall.

worn very late in the fall.

Mrs. Martha K., Vernon, Texas.—The deep shaped berthas in all manner of fabrics are much worn and tucks of every kind are the favorite trimming. One pretty finish of the tuckings is to outline each tuck with a tiny fold of a contrasting color, for instance, a blue tucked blouse can be outlined with delicate pink folds, and a green one with folds of black, and so on making a simple and quite an attractive bodice.

Mother, Avalon, N. Y.—Black and white Shepherd's plaid will make a very pretty serviceable dress for a child; vest and collar and the belt can be made of white cloth and trimmed with black braid, two widths of the braid may be used, one very wide the other quite narrow. If desired large

I Will Cure You of # Rheumatism

Else No Money Is Wanted.

After 2,000 experiments, I have learned how to cure Rheumatism. Not to turn bony joints into flesh again; that is impossible. But I can cure the disease always, at any stage, and forever.

I ask for no money. Simply write me a postal and I will send you an order on your nearest druggist for six bottles Dr. Shoop's Rheumatic Cure, for every druggist keeps it. Usel for a month and, iff it succeeds, the cost is only $5.50. If it fails, I will pay your druggist myself.

I have no samples, because any medicine that can affect Rheumatism quickly must be drugged to the verge of danger. I use no such drugs, and it is folly to take them. You must get the disease out of the blood.

My remedy does that, even in the most difficult, obstinate cases. No matter how impossible this seems to you, I know it and I take the risk. I have cured tens of thousands of cases in this way, and my records show that 39 out of 40 who get those six bottles pay gladly. I have learned that people in general are honest with a physician who cures them. That is all I ask. If I fail I don't expect a penny from you.

Simply write me a postal card or letter. I will send you my book about Rheumatism, and an order for the medicine. Take it for a month, as it won't harm you anyway. If it fails, it is free, and I leave the decision with you. Address Dr. Shoop, Box 304. Racine, Wis.

Mild cases, not chronic, are often cured by one or two bottles. At all druggists.

School Miss, Tucker, Utah.—The most useful petticoats are made of gingham or plain chambray, a ruffle on the bottom edged with tiny white braid or buttonholed in the same color as the skirt. (2) Make the flannel petticoat with a deep yoke of muslin; gore the widths of flannel and putthen on the yoke plain. (3) Wear with the cloth tailor made suit a dainty blouse of soft silk. Every thing for a school girl must be dainty, and made in the simplest manner. (4) Use the combination braid on sailor suit in this way; take a wide blue braid, then the white braid half as wide as the blue, and silver, half as wide as the white. This is particularly striking and something new and pleasing.

Miss Julia M., Silverlake, Wis.—You can make collars innumerable. One can be made of the corners of a fine embroidered handkerchief. Cut off three corners as large as you like, overlay each just a little and sew to the band; another may be made of white lawn with a hem of French knots in black or any color. Another can be made of ecru linen by turning the hem up on the right side and holding in place with tiny French knots of white. A pretty one of thin Swiss muslin can be designed simply with a hem and tiny tucks.

"The only way to stop drinkin' that I knows of jest at the present time," broke in Perk Woodrow, "will be to turn Mis' Welthy Runnells of our neighborhood loose on 'em. She's our great, practical, git-up-and-git-there temperance reformer jest at the present writin'."

"Hadn't heered," said the Postmaster.

"Wal, she's jest gittin' well loosened up in her gait," said Perk. "Her first crack hes dropped kind of flat but she's up with second wind."

Then Perk went on to relate the recent sensational doings in the Twin Tree district. It was this way:

was this way:

was this way:

Miss Welthy Ann Runnells, spinster, lives down there. At first she perked her nose and flouted the efforts of Carrie Nation of Kansas. But when she saw the masher's work commended in her monthly denominational paper, "The Home Treasury and Intelligencer," Miss Welthy changed her mind. She always allows the Treasury to make up her mind on all matthe Treasury to make up her mind on all mat-the Treasury to make up her mind on all matters mundane.

"I reckin I have wronged a good and true woman in my thoughts," meditated Welthy Ann as she wrinkled her brows against the heat and took her bi-weekly tin of cream o' tantar biscuit from the oven, "I s'pose I reelly ought to do suthin' to show her that I am in sympathy with her movement. I might send her a new hatchet, perhaps!"

But, re-perusing the Intelligencer that afternoon, Miss Runnells noted that enthusiastic sympathizers in various parts of the

But, re-perusing the Intelligencer that afternoon, Miss Runnells noted that enthusiastic sympathizers in various parts of the United States had already sent the Kansas "hatcheter" several tons of the weapons. Miss Runnells tried to think of other ways of assisting but from all she could gather the woman out west seemed to be entirely capable of going it alone. But Welthy Ann's favorite apothegm is: "A way is always opened."

That afternoon Mrs. Ez. Rabb dropped in at the back door with her apron over her head. In the course of conversation the caller said: "They do tell me that it's a sight, the way old Hussey is runnin' that store of his lately. Them as know talk it right out and say that he is peddlin' out old cider to nigh about whos'ever wants it. I heerd that he sold some to Mel. Briggses' boys and they went home pritty well set up. An' I heerd that Mis' Tet. Spooner had to go down an' jest beg old Hussey not to sell any more cider to her husband. You could hear her all over the neighborhood talkin' to the old fool for you know he is so dratted deef that he couldn't hear Gab'rel's trump ten feet away. If he sold hard cider to kin o' mine I'd go in an' chop him the way that woman out in Kansas somewheres has been doin' to them that he couldn't hear Gab'rel's trump ten feet away. If he sold hard cider to kin o' mine I'd go in an' chop him the way that woman out in Kansas somewheres has been doin' to them rummies. I'd learn him!"

Now that gave Welthy Ann Runnells an idea. She thought the matter over after her caller "had traipsed back home." Said she to herself: "I'm jest a lone old maid with no kin nigher'n second cousins an' if I should git my etarnal head cuffed off it would only be my own lookout. An' further'n that, I hain't afraid of any old deef Hussey that ever poured Janawarry molasses through a tunnel. An' if the Dickdale Banner of Freedom has a piece about how I smashed Hussey's place, I swan, I'll mark the paper and send it out west to that Nation woman to show her that her sisters in the east are holdin' up her hands while the battle goes on." A red spot flickered dimly on either of Miss Welthy's faded cheeks as she thought on the matter. Then she put her strictly Gothic bonnet on her severely Gothic head and arose in her Gothic angularity and took the hatchet with which she had self-reliantly chopped kindlings for many a year. Hussey's store was the village emporium. Miss Runnells had always done her trading there and was on the best terms with the old man who owned it.

"I must start right in on him, pitch hot,"

Miss Runnells had always done her trading there and was on the best terms with the old man who owned it.

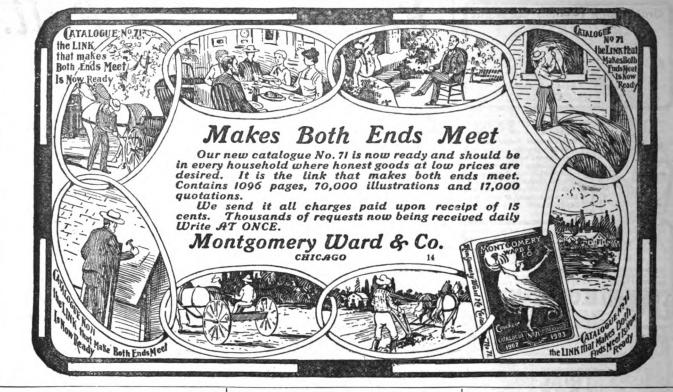

"I must start right in on him, pitch hot," said Miss Welthy to herself "for if I git to talkin' with him I shall be sociable the first thing I know. He's allus took my eggs and paid a good price for 'em and—well, I jest mustn't git to soft'nin', that's all. I have got my bounden duty to perform."

She was humming under her breath rather harshly when she entered the store. "Dare to be a Dan'yel, dare to stand alone." The usual crowd of old codgers was sitting back of the stove, tunking their canes upon the floor and holding endless discussions over nothing. Hussey was weighing two pounds of tenpenny nails and had his eyes down close to the scale beam while he gingerly nicked the weight along the notches.

Miss Welthy advanced to the counter. "Mister Hussey," she said as bravely as she could.

The old man was so absorbed in finding the right hat he did not notice.

The old man was so absorbed in finding the right nick that he did not notice her presence. Besides, he was very deaf.
"Mister Hussey!" she called more sharply. Miss Runnells was ordinarily very mild but now her tartness aroused the interest of the contingent back of the stove.

"Reckin' Ike must have giv' her some squiggly cheese," suggested one of the old men humorously.

When she had called his name a third time

Hussey slowly straightened up, holding to his back.
"Them blame old eyes of mine are gitting"

"Them blame old eyes of mine are gittin' duller'n a bush scythe in swale grass," he said. "Afternoon, Miss Welthy," he added with cheery greeting. "I'll 'tend to ye jest as soon as I git these nails done up."

Miss Runnells poked her chin forward belligerently. "Ye'll 'tend to me right now," she snapped. Then she pulled her hatchet from under her shawl. "I've come as an avenger," she cried.

under her shawl. "I've come as an avenger," she cried.
"Hay?" queried Uncle Hussey with his hand hollowed at his ear.
"This hatchet is an avenger."
"'Hatchet to lend yer?' Why, I don't want to borry no hatchet, Miss Welthy."
Spinster Runnells took full breath and shouted, "I'm goin' to hatchet your place."
"Hay?"
"I'm goin' to hatchet—"
Uncle Hussey looked at the weapon critically. "Match it?" he repeated; "no, I'm 'fraid I can't, Miss Welthy. I'm gittin' low on hatchets."
"Where is that mis'able cider barrel?"

"Where is that mis'able cider barrel?" screamed Miss Runnells. She was white and her voice was trembling.

"Hay?" cried Uncle Hussey, noticing her emotion now and expressing great bewilderment in the bland features above his frosty whisker fringe.

"Where is that tank of Satan—that cider bar-l, that—"

rel, that—"
The spinster

rel, that—"
The spinster was now so excited that her voice nearly failed her and the old man could not understand. She licked her dry lips with her tongue and tried again. She grasped the store keeper by the lapel of his jumper and drew him toward her across the counter.
"Where is that cider barrel?"
"Tried to quarrel? Why,

"Where is that cider barrel?"
"Tried to quarrel? Why, Miss Welthy, ye know I've never had no trouble with ye in all my life, an' I don't want to have, neither."
"I hain't talkin' about no quarrel. I want to know where that hellbroth is, that—"

Uncle Hussey's jaw dropped and he gaped forward in his effort to understand. His brows were wrinkled in perplexity. He stared around the store and gazed on the astonished old men behind the stove as if seeking aid from them. One of them came doddering up with his cane. "What is Miss Runnells sayin' of?" Uncle Hussey asked in the stuffy tones of the deaf. "I can't git head nor tail of it."
The old man got close up to the store keeper and bellowed in his ear. "Miss Runnells wants to know where the cider barrel—CIDER barrel is. Reckin she wants to buy some cider—some CIDER."
"Ah-h! Ow-w-w!" cried Uncle Hussey with light beaming over his countenance. "Cider—

"Ah-h! Ow-w-w!" cried Uncle Hussey with light beaming over his countenance. "Cider—cider? Yas, I've got some cider, sech as it is. But it harder'n tunket, Miss Welthy, an, I reelly don't believe ye'd want it. I did hav' some reel good sweet cider a while ago but the air got into it an' sp'iled it."
"Show me that cider," demanded the spinster, gripping her hatchet.
Uncle Hussey looked blankly at the other man. "What she say, Jeff?" he asked.
Jeff took in a big breath. "She's bound to hav' some of it," he roared. But he added in lower tones, turning to Miss Runnells. "But land, mum, it'll lay ye out stiffer'n a poker. "Tain't fit for wimmen to drink."
"I didn't s'pose ye was in any ways took to'ards hard cider," said Uncle Hussey reproachfully. "But if ye're reelly set on havin's some I'll 'commodate ye."
"I' don't want to drink it," Miss Welthy screamed.
"That's right—I never did think it, of ye." "Ah-h! Ow-w-w!" cried Uncle Hussey with

"If don't want to drink it," Miss Welthy screamed.

"That's-right—I never did think it of ye," assented Uncle Hussey pityingly. "But wimmen folks is queer critters. P'raps Doc. Adams ordered it for ye?" he suggested. Miss Runnells made no answer. Her breath was exhausted and most of her courage, too. The store keeper lighted a stubby and malodorous candle and started for the cellar stairs. Miss Welthy followed at his heels. He protested that there was no occasion for her coming along. She insisted greatly to the astonishment of Uncle Hussey and the old codgers who as yet had not the least idea as to what it all meant. So Uncle Hussey tottered on ahead and Miss Runnells followed, gathering her skirts around her Gothic form and braving the dangers of the shaking and gloomy stairway.

"These old maids is consarned suspicious critters," philosophized one of the old men.

"Seems to be bound that she don't git kairosene ile instid o' hard cider." But breaking on the laugh that greeted this sally came strange and disquieting noises from down cellar. Tunk! tunk! tunk! there noises from down cellar.

Tunk! tunk! tunk! there sounded a hollow beating of the hatchet on a cask. Over all swelled the protesting tones of Uncle Hussey.

"Hi there—hay there, Miss Welthy, what the nation ye doin' to my cider barre!"

Tunk! tunkity, tunk! went on the spasmodic chopping.

"Ding swat ye, Miss Welthy, ye're poundin' the head of it right in."

Then there was the sound of a spilt and swoosh and the despairing wail of the store keeper. "Ye've done it! Ye've done it an' didn't I say ye would?"

The next moment Miss Welthy Ann Runnells came bouncing up the dark stairs. With her nose high in the air, holding the dripping hatchet in her trembling hand, her cheeks fiaming, she marched past the astonished old loafers who looked after her with gaping mouths. Behind her puffed and spluttered Uncle Hussey. He waited back in the gloom of the stairway, the flaring candle casting its yellow light against his goggling eyes, framed in their steel bowed spectacles.

of the stairway, the flaring candle casting its yellow light against his goggling eyes, framed in their steel bowed spectacles.

"Has she gone?" he gasped huskily.

"Went streakin' it through here like the mill tail o' Tophet," ejaculated an old man.

"Do you boys hav' any idee what she has done?"

"Saounded like she was breakin' up haouse-keep-

"Saounded like she was breakin' up haouse-keepin' down there."

"Wal, s'r, she took that 'ere hatchet o' heer'n an' she paounded in the head o' that 'ere cider barrel an' ev'ry blame drop of it has run aout. Now don't it beat the nation what possessed her to do that?"

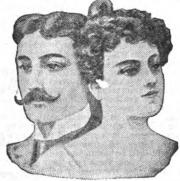

"I've hear'n tell," suggested one of the old men, gested one of the old men, "that all them Runnellses git loony long about her time o' life. Mis' Hi. Jephson, she that was a Runnells, took her own life some years ago."

"Didn't she say nothin' when she was a-doin' it?" asked one of the party.

"Wal, I asked her over an' over what she was a-tryin' to do an' she kep' sayin' suthin' that I couldn't ketch very well. I can't hear an' that 'ere hatchet was racketin' away all the whol', contin'yal time. 'Twas suthin' about cancers or Kansas or can't sass me, or suthin' I dunno what. But land sakes, I hain't never sassed her in all my born days. An' she kep' a-sayin' that she didn't care a nation 'bout what she done—or suthin' like that. I sh'd sartin' say she's gone plum off'n her hooks."

The old men looked at one another. None of them had heard about the crusade in Kansas or of the redoubtable Carrie Nation, or if they ever had known of the affair it had been forgotten in the more engrossing local topics of Dickvale.

"Reckin Welthy better be tooken care of 'fore she kills some of the neighbors' said Lof'

"Reckin Welthy better be tooken care of 'fore she kills some of the neighbors," said Jeff Denslow at last. "I'll speak to the s'lec'man about it when I go 'long home. I swow it's too bad, for she's allus been a dretful good hand in sickness—dretful neighborly."

"What can ye expect of an old maid with only a cat and few feather-legged Brahma hens," growled Uncle Hussey, opening his ledger. Then he charged "one cider barrel" to the estate of Welthy Ann Runnells, for he already reckoned her as good as in the insane asylum. asylum

And thus flat fell the temperance crusade in e "Twin Tree" district at Cobb's Corner.

Blackfish Oil.

HE most expensive oil used for lubricating purposes is worth $60 a gallon. It comes from the blackfish and the porpoise and its high price is due to the fact that only a very small quantity can be taken from each fish. It is known as "head oil" and is taken from the under jaw and the peculiar fatty growth on the rostrum of the skull just back of the blow hole. The oil is used almost exclusively for lubricating watches, and it owes its peculiar value to the fact that it never is affected in the slightest by changes in temperature. It is also very lasting in quality, one application in five years being enough to keep a watch running smoothly. Of late years the blackfish and porpoise have become quite scarce, so much so that their oil has trebled in value. After rendering the oil in its crude state the buyer tests it in various ways in order to be sure of the quality and to eliminate any objectionable ingredient that it may contain. It is then placed in bottles and bleached, a process requiring some skill and knowledge of the properties of the oil. It then finds a ready market among watch manufacturers.

AN INTERESTING DEVELOPMENT.

It is interesting to note the immense development of the Cash Buyers' Union whose advertising appears in these columns year in and year out. The Cash Buyers' Union has made a specialty of selling high grade sewing machines, direct from its factory at less than half the price at which similar standard machines are sold under the old plan. Women who sew will be interested in the proposition they offer, and should write for their illustrated, free catalogue, containing all styles of machines, attachments and samples of work.

read what is written rapidly and accurately. Two methods are used in the printing of books here. In one the type used that resembles ordinary type and characters are produced in relief resembling ordinary printed letters. By the other system dots are embossed upon the paper in different combinations and positions to represent different letters. This last way is known as the Braille system and is the invention of a Frenchman. The work not only in this institution but in others over the country is being rapidly developed so that some relief from absolute dependence on others in reading and studying pendence on others in reading and studying seems to be promised those afflicted with blindness.

Hazel Eyes, Mashattan, Kans.—Tampa is a city of about sixteen thousand people on the west coast of Florida, and is one of the best towns in the state. We can not give you prices of real estate. If you will write to G. D. Ackerly, G. P. A., J. T. & K. W. Railway, Jacksonville, asking for such information as you require he will give it to you. Make your questions definite so he will know what you want to know and can tell you. Also write to Editor The Courier-Informant, Bartow, Fla., for copies of his paper, telling him what you want to know. Bartow is in the country back of Tampa and it is rich in an agricultural way.

L. A. Moore, Philomath, Ore.—What Comfort's correspondent said of Western Oregon applied especially to the coast country. We are glad to correct any false impression that may have resulted, and take pleasure in making your announcement that grain and fruit in your section of the state, especially fruit, are good producers and that fine crops of prunes are raised every year. We know of the beautiful apples that come from Oregon and are pleased to know they grow about Philomath. We give your address in full so that if any one who reads Comfort wishes to write to you he can do so, and we heartily recommend Oregon to all home seekers because we believe it is one of the choice states of this Union.

Dr. M. O. Perkins, Beaumont, Texas, writes for the benefit of "E. Don Carlos, Independence, Iowa.—Unless you have money and can talk Spanish we would not advise you to go to Mexico to go into farming or oranching. You can do much better in the United States unless you have unlimited capital. If you want to try farming on other than your native soil you had better go to Cuba. We do not recommend it to you, but there is a better chance there for a man with $3,000 to $5,000 than there is in Mexico.

Grover, Milwaukee, Wis.—You would probably do well in any thriving southern town if you will open a grocery store and run it with northern energy and plenty of advertising in the local newspapers. As a rule the retail grocer in southern towns is disposed to be rather careless and to wait for business rather than to hustle after it. You should go pretty well south where the northern influence is not felt, asi it is in those states on the border. We do not know your politics, but whatever they are keep them in the background. You are not going south to become a statesman, but to make money as a strictly business man. Make a trip through the section that you think you would like best, and learn about it from actual observation.

Mrs. D. McD., Toledo, Ohio.—We would advise against your coming to New York City to open a boarding house. Bents are extravagantly high, houses of 14 to 16 rooms, two miles from the shopping district, bringing from $1,000 to $3,500 a year, and all provisions and serving hire costing heavily. It is not always quite so hard as it is just now, but New York is a very expensive place and unless you are fortunate in getting an established business, or in having capital sufficient to enable you to open a house that will command the highest class of boarders you will be pretty sure to lose everything you put into it.

Nothing is more certain than that the use of so called tonics, stimulants and medicines, which depend upon alcohol for their effect, is injurious to health in the long run.

What goes up must come down and the elevation of spirits, the temporary exhilaration resulting from a dose of medicine containing alcohol, will certainly be followed in a few hours by a corresponding depression to relieve which another dose must be taken.

In other words, many liquid patent medicines derive their effect entirely from the alcohol they contain.

hol they contain.

Alcohol, and medicines containing it, are temporary stimulants and not in any sense a true tonic. In fact it is doubtful if any medicines or drug is a real tonic.

cines or drug is a real tonic.

A true tonic is something which will renew, replenish, build up the exhausted nervous system and wasted tissues of the body, something that will enrich the blood and endow it with the proper proportions of red and white corpuscles which prevent or destroy disease germs. This is what a real tonic should do and no drug or alcoholic stimulant will do it.

The only true tonic in nature is wholesome food, thoroughly digested. Every particle of nervous energy, every minute muscle, fibre and drop of blood is created daily from the food we digest.

digest.

The mere eating of food has little to do with the repair of waste tissue but the perfect digestion of the food eaten has everything to do with it.

The reason so few people have perfect digestion is because from wrong habits of living the stomach has gradually lost the power to secrete the gastric juice, peptones and acids in sufficient quantity.

To cure indigestion and stomach troubles it is necessary to take after meals some harmless.

To cure indigestion and stomach troubles it is necessary to take after meals some harmless preparation which will supply the natural peptone and diastase which every weak stomach lacks, and probably the best preparation of this character is Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets which may be found in every drug store and which contain in pleasant palatable form the wholesome peptone and diastase which nature requires for prompt digestion.

One or two of these excellent tablets taken after meals will prevent souring, fermentation and acidity and insure complete digestion and assimilation.

and acidity and insure complete digestion and assimilation.
Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are equally valable for little children as for adults, as they contain nothing harmful or stimulating but only the natural digestives.

One of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets will digest 1,800 grains of meat, eggs or other wholesome food, and they are in every sense a genuine tonic because they bring about in the only natural way a restorative of nerve power, a building up of lost tissue and appetite, in the only way it can be done by the digestion and assimilation of wholesome food.

Inquirer.—A marriage between first cousins is valid in many of the States of the Union; we cannot undertake to look up the statutes of every State in order to give a list of the states permitting such marriage, but if you will write us in what State you wish to get married, we will advise you as to whether a marriage between coustins is valid there. Send us a self-addressed stamped envelope and the information will be sent you by return mail

J. R. M.—In case the party who signed your name without your consent should return to the State, you can certainly see to it that he is prosecuted for forgery.

R. W. H.—Your landlord must abide by the terms of his contract. If he agreed to let you live in his house in consideration of your wife's teaching his daughter, you certainly need pay no rent. If however he insists on payment of rent and you pay it, your wife can recover a reasonable price for her music lessons passed upon it.

K. L. B.—We know of no law that will permit another person to take water from your well without your permission and against your protest.

B. F. C.—If the party who made the contract with you refuses now to carry it out, you should take immediate steps to recover the property of which he took possession. Demand it back of him and if he refuses, you must bring an action at law to recover it.

M. E. D.—Any company that issues stock must be in-corporated. It is not necessary that it be incorporated in the state where the property is located and where its principal office is. It may be incorporated under the laws of any other state. Many of the largest corporations in the country are incorporated under the laws of other states than where their principal place of business is located.

F. J. D.—No one has a right to use his property in such a way as to trespass on his neighbors legal rights. The ordinances of most towns provide the distance at which barns can be built from another's property. What the ordinances of your place provide, we have no means of ascertaining. Ask your town clerk. If the party who proposes to erect the barn is acting illegally, you can stop him from building by sueing out an injunction to prevent him from progressing with the work.

Miss E. V. H.—According to the facts stated in your letter, you have no interest in the farm in question. The title to property can only be tied up for three generations. The deed made by your mother seems to have been valid and probably passed a good title to the purchaser.

Manners and Looks.

"Virtue itself offends, when coupled with forbidding manners."-Bishop Middleton.

Tommy's Girl, Newberg, Ore.—Ordinarily the gentleman gives the lady his left arm, although he may do as he pleases. The theory is that if he has his right arm free he can better protect her if necessary. (2) Pie should be eaten with a fork. We suppose if one puts milk on his pie, as some do, a spoon might be necessary. (3) We believe the "jig" is not danced except as an entertainment to those who want to see it. It is proper enough, and might be classed as a professional dance. At least we so understand the "jig," though it may have a different meaning in Oregon.

Kandahar, Mexico, Wis.—The very best recipe for a brown tan is to let it wear off. It is a good healthy sign, and your beauty will not suffer by letting it remain on awhile. Besides, at this season it is quite fashionable.

Rose, Kell, Ills.—A girl of fourteen should wear son it is quite fashionable.

Rose, Kell, Ills.—A girl of fourteen should wear her dress about to her shoe-tops, or a little above if she is not a large girl. (2) It is not the custom in the best society for girls to wear boys' rings, or the reverse, but such things are frequently done. We do not recommend it. (3) In view of the fact that you might marry one of your stepbrothers, we should say that you should not permit any more kissing from them than any other men of your acquaintance, although the rule might be relaxed somewhat if you had grown up together from childhood as brother and sister. (4) Engaged couples only may kiss with entire propriety.

J. G. H., Orbisonia, Pa.—Certainly not. (2) The lady may write to the man at his request, if she wants to, but it is customary for the man to write first. (3) We think the lady should invite a caller to call again, but some very well bred people do not do so. It seems to be rather an unwelcome parting to have a guest go away without a world wishing to see him again.

Perplexed One, Minneapolis, Minn.—We should think-they could tall ware to the search.

wishing to see him again.

Perplexed One, Minneapolis, Minn.—We should think they could tell you in Minneapolis what was the proper costume for such an occasion. In our opinion you could very appropriately wear any of the white wool stuffs that are made for Winter wear. We think white would be preferable to any color, but you would probably find it more expensive than the dark stuffs. Nun's veiling, albatross, cashmere and serge are the names of the white goods.

Lenore, Galesburg, Ills.—A red nose is something that you must talk to your doctor about. (2) Yes. (3) Five feet eight inches is unusually tall for a girl of fifteen, and 138 pounds is not too heavy for that height. You are not "fat" by fifty pounds at least.

Loretta, Newport, R. I.—Do not give the young man your picture unless you are very good friends and you have every confidence in him. (2) We believe it is customary in college towns for the girls to wear the boys' class pins. There cannot be any serious harm in it. (3) Sixteen-year-old girls should wear their dresses fully down to their shoetops, or even longer, depending somewhat upon the size of the girl and the height of the shoe top. We might make a better gauge by saying to the ankle bone.

might make a better gauge by saying to the ankle bone.

Two Little Crackers, Mossy Head, Fla.—It is not a matter of good taste or bad for the young man to drive home from church at night at a very slow gait. It is a matter of sentiment. Most young people like it. If you do not, you should tell the young man to drive fast. (2) We should think the arrival of a young niece was a matter of congratulation from a young man to the young lady who was the aunt. Just what reply she should make is not down in the books. You must make one for yourself. (3) The rule is for the man not to walk between two ladies. However, if they want to take his arms, there is no other way. The rule may be made to suit the conditions. (4) We believe it is the custom of engaged couples of any and all kinds of society to kiss when they want to. (4) A kiss "under the mistletce" might be excused as one of the extravagances of the holiday season. Still even this kind of kissing is frowned upon by proper people.

Be and D., Indianapolis, Ind.—Customs vary. In some places young men and women go boating at night; in some they do not, unless accompanied by a chaperone. If no one objects to your going alone with a young man, then you may go. (2) A girl of eighteen should wear to a wedding a very simple gown of white, unless she has come out in society, as some girls of 18 do. Then she may dress as elaborately as she can afford. (3) There is no rule but the lady's wish as to how often a gentleman should call on her. Her parents, however, are to be consulted.

be consulted.

Country Girl, Waterville, Kans.—Olives are eaten from the fingers, and bread is taken with the fingers. Never with a fork. (2) When a lady takes a man home with her, she opens the door and leads the way in, but he should shut the door, unless he has been there previously and knows what to do and where to go. (3) The gentleman's address is New York City.

New York City.

Elinor, St. Ilmo, Ills.—To prevent hair from falling out use the following tonic: Phenic acid, two grams; tincture vomica, seven and one-half grams; tincture of red cinchona, thirty grams; tincture of cantharides, two grams; cologne, one-hundred and eighty grams; sweet almond oil, sixty grams. Apply to the roots of the hair with a soft sponge once or twice a day.

Blair Sisters Clyde, Ohio,—There is no more or twice a day.

Blair Sisters, Clyde, Ohio.—There is no more harm in dancing than there is in the usual games played at parties. (2) Blonde. (3) Damon and Pythias, Saul and Jonathan, Washington and Ladayette, Bertram and Bruce, Clyde and Cameron, Duncan and Douglass, Eric and Ethelbert, and many, many others would be good names for twin boys. (3) One plate of ice cream is the usual amount eaten by one lady at a party, but if she wanted more it would not be very improper for her to take it. to take it.

Inquisitive, Canandaigua, N. Y.—It is a little early yet to say what will be the prevailing color this Winter. A new shade just showing itself is "burnt orange," a reddish yellow, which will have a run for a time no doubt, and then disappear. Green is yet popular, and blue promises to be much worn. (2) If you and the other young lady intend to quarrel about which one of you should write to the other first, possibly you had better not write at all. It is as much one's place as the other to write first.

to write first.

Watter and Charley, Gallup, Ohio.—If the other girl's "gentleman friend" asks another girl to go home with him she may accept his company as far as the rules of etiquette are concerned. Personally she may decide the question as she pleases. But why do you say "gentleman friend?" That is bad form. Simply say "friend", or better still call the man by name and those who are interested will know the rest. (2) It is too late to go "buggy riding" after a party. But why not say "driving" instead of "buggy riding"? (3) There is no rule by which a gentleman asks a lady for her company. The plainest and simplest way is best. (4) Girls of seventeen are not usually in society, where it would be necessary to accept gentlemen's company. If they are, it is quite proper.

Giggler, Sun, Kans.—It may be proper enough, but it is not customary for a young lady to ask a man to go home with her. Except, of course, it becomes necessary for her to do so. (2) Yes. (3) "Done up" hair is not quite appropriate for fourteen year old girls. (4) A girl at a boarding school should wear to a supper, and at all times, the very simplest and prettiest things she can afford. "Sweet simplicity" should be a study with her, as much as books are.

Lara, Eulonia, S. C.—A gentleman should not take a lady's arm unless it is necessary for him to do so to help her along. He should offer her his arm.

E. M. B., Oakville, Iowa.—It is not exactly wrong for young ladies and gentlemen who are not acquainted, to talk over the telephone, but, unless it is a necessity to do so, on business or otherwise, it is not done any more than the same persons would talk on the street or elsewhere. (2) A "good, sensible girl of sixteen" will not keep company with a young man of twenty, therefore we need not tell you she is too young. She may know the young man and be very nice to him, but she will wait, if she is a "good, sensible" girl until she is twenty before she "keeps company" with him. ## Talks With Girls.

Conducted by Cousin Marion.

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one month.

The melancholy days have not yet come, and though it is October, the month when the poet says they begin, let us keep our spirits up and show him that we have no melancholy days. We may have our troubles, but we can be brave and smile although our hearts are sore. So let us smile when we may, spring or autumn; and now to work, which is not half as bad as being idle.

Idle.

The first cousin to come to my hand is Fidelis of Nashville, Tenn., who has a "steady" who will not speak of love or marriage though he has been attentive for two years, and she wants to know what to do. It is usually best to wait in such cases. But it will often bring matters to a settlement if the girl neglects the man a little, and talks to him judiciously about other men who are seeking her hand. Then if he doesn't speak up, drop him. He is too stupid to be an agreeable husband anyway.

G. B. C. D. Afton. Minn.—All the New York

G. B. C. D., Afton, Minn.—All the New York papers of the latter part of March for several days contained more or less about Miss Gladys Deacon, but I can not give you exact dates. The Herald, World, Journal, morning and evening editions, contained pictures of her.

contained pictures of her.

A. S. H., Bellows Falls, Vt.—The address of the gentleman is simply New York City. Or you might add "Waldorf Astoria Hotel."

Psyche, Mexico, Mo.—If the engagement is a positive one, you may write to him as often as you please. For such a long engagement it is probably best not to give the ring until within a few months of your marriage, but that is a matter to determine between you.

M. and S., Angleton, Texas.—Girls of sixteen still of your marriage, but that is a matter to determine between you.

M. and S., Angleton, Texas.—Girls of sixteen still in school should not "keep company" with a man of twenty-eight or any other age. Books before beaus. (2) Send some friend to the young man who will not return your notes and pictures and demand them. (3) If a young man tries to kiss you tell him pleasantly and good naturedly, as a sister would talk to him, what you think of such familiarity and ask him if he thinks it is quite the nice and proper thing for a girl to do. Reason with him a little while and he will become ashamed of himself and probably fall in love with you, really and truly. Then it would be different.

Magnolia, Grandin, Fla.—If the young man says he knows you love him, even though you have not said so, you will have to answer him as best you can, providing he is right. If he is wrong, you can let him see very quickly how mistaken he is. (2) The young man cannot claim your exclusive attention unless he is engaged to you. Do as you please about your company until he asks you to be his wife.

his wife.

Wilhelmine, Marion, S. D.—I do not wish to crush your idol, but if you are wise you will not trust the your gan until he says definitely that he wants you to marry him. He is evidently a firt and simply wants to get you in love with him for his own sport. He showed that when he was willing to say he was engaged to you so he could kiss you. He is the kind that will bear watching.

Innocent, Canandaigua, N. Y.—Do what you can to show your friend that she is risking her reputation by associating with a disreputable man, and if she will not listen to you, let her go her way. You have your own good name to protect and can not risk it by keeping her as your friend.

Trixy, Lee, N. D.—A girl whom you had never Trisy, Lee, N. D.—A girl whom you had never met who would call attention to your hat as that one did, is simply an "Indian," and ought to go out and live in the wilds. She is hopelessly badmannered. All you can do is to feel sorry for her.

Missouri Girl, Clifton Hill, Mo.—Ask your mother the questions you have asked me. Mothers know best what to tell fifteen year old girls about their Silverhair, Waukomis, Okla.—When ayoung man winks at a girl he means to see if she has no better manners than he has. Don't notice him. He ought to be herded with the cattle. (2) The waist swing dance is too familiar and common. Don't permit it. (3) The lady speaks first.

Dimple, Paducah, Ky.—A scarf pin is always acceptable, or a match safe, or cigar cutter, in silver; or a postage stamp case, or a silver tipped cane, or any one of a dozen things in silver for men, that are pretty, useful and inexpensive, will make a present for a young man on his twenty-first birthday.

E. E. W.—Ypsilanti, Mich:—There is no way of getting your book before the public except through the publishers, and their judgment must be taken. Send your Mss. to them, and if they want it they will take it. Some firms publish books if the authors will pay from $200 to $300 and become partners, as it were, in the venture. If your book should be a good seller, you would make more this way than on royalty. Write to the Abbey Press, New York City. If you do not want to pay, then keep on sending it around. There are no publishers who print books for beginners on the chances.

lady is New York City. She is about thirty years old. (2) The supply of "authors' work of real merit" does not exceed the demand. It does not equal it, the publishers say.

Ping, Manistee, Mich.—To the best of my belief there is no state in which a minor can marry without the consent of parents or guardian. You are very foolish to think of defying your parents at your age and marrying, no matter how worthy the man is. If he is really worthy he will not permit you to do anything so rash.

Is it any wonder with the way people excite, abuse and neglect their hearts, that 69 in every 100 are wrong or strange if yours is? If you aren't sure about it, or even if you KNOW you have a settled heart disease in which doctors if you know you have a settled heart disease in which doctors and remedies have failed, why don't you ask our advice and help? We have made Heart and Nerve Diseases—which almost always go together—our life study. We treat them upon new principles and with a new remedy, and we fail in only one case in more than two hundred. To fully prove the virtue of our remedy, to show that it is different from anything else and will do for you just what it has for thousands of other sufferers, we will send FREE A BOTTLE OF

DR. FULLER'S HEART AND NERVE TABLETS, enough for a good, fair treatment, to settle all question—all doubt.

"HEART FACTS," with colored pictures and plain rules for perfect self-examination, tells you more than most physicians know about the heart and nerves.

Some symptoms of these diseases are palpitation, fluttering, skipping-beats, fainting, choking, smothering, numb spells, dizziness, nightmare, short breath, indigestion, swelling legs, asthma and pain about the heart. Nervousness, sleeplessness, despondency, irritability, trembling. If YOU have any one of these your heart or nerves are wrong! You know the awful dread and danger you are in—send now! Birthmark" is the title under the first palm I shall read this time. It indicates the hand of a lady, being distinctly feminine lady, being distinctly feminine in every way. She is gentle, refined and womanly, but nervous and somewhat timid; loves to depend upon others and to be cared for, though she has the courage to look out for herself if it is necessary. A little more perseverance and self-reliance, however, would help her to get on in the world and make life easier for her. I would advise her to cultivate the habit of thinking and deciding for herself more than she naturally does. ciding for herself more than she naturally does.

She has improved somewhat in this particular, however, since she was sixteen years old. Her health is in the main good al-though she was a delicate child, and delicate child, and she will not be very long-lived unless she takes particularly good care of herself at the age of forty-five to fifty. She is romantic in her tastes and fond of fiction and poetry. fiction and poetry. If she should write she would learn to

If she should write she would learn to excel in these lines; the only trouble being in her lack of "stick-to-a-tiv-ness;" that is, she would give up trying and not be willing to "keep everlastingly at it," as one must to succeed. She has a good fate line which shows that she can be successful and her line of Apollo or riches is good. She will see a good deal of trouble, however, and will always have the opposition of relatives to her various undertakings. Especially is this true before the age of thirty. She will marry not far from the age of twenty-five and there will come some decided change in her life about thirty. I do not think her marriage will last over ten years, and she will outlive her husband. She has always been a favorite with the opposite sex and will be as long as she lives, as she is good company and has a great deal of tact; she will know how to manage a man without seeming to do so, a great gift to woman and one of the best lubricators for the machinery of married life.

"E. Judy" has a good feminine hand also. She has great faith in her own ability and will always have the courage of her convictions, even to overdoing it. She always have the even to over-doing it. She has the quality as much over-developed as the last subject had it lacking. It will be well for this one to seek advice from those competent those competent to advise her, and to take heed to what they tell her. She is not so nervous as the previous subject, either, and hav-ing a good head-line will be able line will be able to take things calmly and philosophically. In fact, I think she is one that can be relied on to "keep cool" in the face of any danger and she has much courage and self-reliance. She will never bear children and I do not think she will marry. If she does, the affair will not last long and she will be happier alone. She will outlive her husband, if she marries, but she will not live to be fifty. At or near the age of thirty she will be protected from some danger to her life, either from illness or some outside force. She will have an opportunity for second marriage either from illness or some outside force. She will have an opportunity for second marriage about the age of forty and she will do well to take it, as I see happiness there; but she will not live many years afterward anyway. She is very ambitious and will realize some of her dreams. She is of a practical turn, rather than romantic, and will be a valuable, helpful member of the community in which she lives. She, too, will be popular with the opposite sex and will have several affairs of the heart, and several offers of marriage. But she will be sensible about them and will not accept unless she sees that it will be best, or feels that it will be so. On the whole, this is a fortunate hand and although she will not have a remarkably long life it will be a reasonably happy one; in other life it will be a reasonably happy one; in other words she will know how to get the most out

She married early in life and makes a good wife, as near as I can judge although the marriage lines do not appear at all under the little finger, as they should, and as they probably do in the hand itself. I am very much inclined to agree with Cheiro that it is never safe to read a drawing, on the ground that the little lines that do not seem important enough to draw, will often change the entire reading. This subject will have exceptionally good health and will live to be very old. She will accumulate money and will be well off in her old age.

"Libbie" sends some excellent impressions of both hands all treated with fixatif so that they did not rub at all. That is always best. Her hands show a life crossed by both good and ill. She was not a very strong child, and her early life was given up to others, but later on she comes out from their influence and learns to stand alone, although not without some opposition. She had an early love-affair, that caused her some trouble, but she outgrew it and lives to know that it is better so. She is a favorite with the other sex but is always cool-headed and does not throw herself away for love as many women do. She marries not far from twenty-five and her married life is happy and successful. After she is fifty they "strike it rich" and although she is well off before, she will find plenty of wealth and the fame that goes with it after she is fifty. Indeed, after thirty-five everything tends toward money-getting and she will find herself steadily improving in circumstances from that time onward. There is a break in the life line about a "close call" at that time from which she will secape and then will live out her days either in a foreign land or in a distant part of her own country. She will travel about a great deal, alcountry. She will travel about a great deal, al-

Astrological Calendar.

HE New Moon, to which we look for indications for November, is a partial eclipse of the Sun which falls on the 31st day of October, at a few minutes past three o'clock in the morning, Washington Time. A figure for that time, at our seat of government, shows the last degrees of the celestial sign Virgo rising with the 20th degree of Gemini on Mercury is therefore the nearly on the cusp of the 2nd house in benevolent aspect with Herschel in the 3rd house, though squared by Saturn in the 42nd house, though squared by Saturn in the 4th house. The eclipse falls in the 2nd house only six degrees from Venus and infavorable aspect with Mars in the 12th house and with Neptune in the 10th house. This figure indicates an unusual degree of excitement in the political affairs of the nation; unusual harmony between the governed classes and public authorities and popula enthusiasm in election matters, endorsing an aggressive attitude of the national authorities in international matters, though there will be much treachery and deceit in political wire-working, especially in treating the great financial questions, and much bitterness and invective against all combinations of capital in industrial matters and great criticism of methods and plans of expenditure of the public money. Schools and hotels will prosper and places of amusement give profit to the management as well as the artist.

At the full Moon, which occurs on the 15th of the month, the great benefic Jupiter will be just rising and the Sun, Mercury and Venus will be in the 9th house. This indicates a good degree of prosperity to the masses of the people and the subordination of the governed to the governing classes. Mars in the 7th points to some unrest or turmoil in the western regions of our country or possessions. There will be some trouble in prisons or the reformatory institutions of the country, either in the nature of disease or violent outbreak among inmaters. Saturn in the 4th points to some unusually severe cold weather for the season, especially in the fir

CELESTIAL CALENDAR FOR NOVEMBER, 1902.

NOVEMBER 1—Saturday. Improve this day vigorously for the transaction of business concerning lands and houses; deal with plumbers, plasterers glaziers, gardeners, farmers, contractors, and builders and the classes generally who are engaged in the laborious and dirty avocations. Do not take the day, however, for any kind of a speculation in commercial circles nor make any beginning of magnitude-in trade.

2—Sunday. Peculiar sentiments and odd expressions will be observed in the extemporaneous discourse of today; contentions and quarrels are to be especially guarded against; thieves will be active at this time and many of them come to grief; let all be guarded against fires.

3—Monday. Give preference to the forenoon for the most important engagements; do not deal in fancy goods nor engage in works of decoration or adornment; the late afternoon and evening encourage the literary avocations; do correspondence and attend to matters of account; mental efforts will be more satisfactory in the evening. goods nor engage in works of decoration or adornment; the late atternoon and evening encourage the literary avocations; do correspondence and attend to matters of account; mental efforts will be more satisfactory in the evening.

4—Tuesday. Enter into no engagements relating to real estate or buildings; have no dealings with miners, agriculturists, or traders in agricultural products; make no contracts with printers, publishers, press-writers, or elderly persons in any walk in life.

5—Wednesday. A superior day, especially for the fine arts; deal in fancy goods and engage in works of decoration or adornment; choose the time also for chemical experiments and for urging all the mechanical pursuits; deal with cutlers, surgeons, tailors and military men; use the middle hours of the day for making applications for favor or advantage from officers of great corporations, public officials or from thine employer.

6—Thursday. Contention and discord will be easy of birth on this day and it will be wise if the beginning of long journeys be postponed for a short season; have extreme caution in all thy business engagements; do not sign any writings of importance, nor engage any help; embarrassments are likely to come to editors, authors, booksellers, publishers, printers, mathematicians, civil engineers, surveyors, lawyers and judges; correspondence goes wrong or gives little ultimate satisfaction and if very important is best postponed; the judgment will prove faulty and all mental productions of the day are best laid aside for future consideration and revision; thieves and swindlers are active and fires are to be guarded against. These suggestions are peculiarly appropriate for persons born about the lith of January or April or the 18th of July or 17th of October, of past years. Nervous troubles will be aggravated and mental afflictions rendered more acute.

7—Friday. Commercial men will find this one of their active and favorable days, though the time is not so favorable for the elegant occupations or the fine arts; give forenoon, but posspone writings and varieties the afternoon.

11—Tuesday. Give preference to the early hours for transactions pertaining to houses and lands, though do not expect to make marked progress in any of the elegant pursuits during the day generally in which money favors are not easily obtained.

12—Weduesday. Begin this day early and urge all manner of business to the utmost; buy goods for trade, broass accommodations and have important dealnamer of business to the utmost; buy goods for trade, seek money accommodations and have important dealings with banks, judges, lawyers and persons of wealth and prominence.

13—Thursday. One of the unfavorable days of the month; begin no important undertaking; have no transaction in real estate or with persons engaged in the dirty avocations; keep out of all kinds of disputes and controversies in the atternoon.

14—Friday. Have caution in all thy business engagements on this day; sign no papers of importance; travel not nor engage any help; financial annoyances arise just at this time to editors, authors, booksellers, publishers and the intellectual classes generally, especially if born about the 26th of January or April or the 30th of July or October, of past years; to such persons correspondence goes wrong, gives little ultimate satisfaction and if very important is best postponed until a more fitting season.

15—Saturday. Make no engagement towards wed-more fitting season.

15 - Saturday. Make no engagement towards wedlock, nor expect much success in the elegant pursuits or from dealings in dry goods or fancy or ornamental wares; ask no favor from thine employer nor seek any advantage from public officials; the afternoon is more favorable and encourages all engagements towards real advantage from puons and engagements towards real favorable and encourages all engagements towards real estate improvement.

16—Sunday. An especially fortunate Sabbath day, inducing mental activity and promoting pulpit eloquence and the enjoyment of literary productions.

17—Monday. Usurers have here a day of profit and advantage and thou shouldst be wary with thy purse, indulging not in any speculation, nor in signing any writing obligating thyself; it is best to give the time to routine matters alone.

18—Tuesday. The very early and very late hours are the best ones of the day—the latter being particularly favorable for mental efforts and appreciation of literary productions; the middle hours are mischievous for success or profit from any of the elegant avocations.

19 Wednesday. Use the forenoon for undertakings concerned with machinery; deal with cutlers, surgeons, chemists, bakers, barbers, tailors, tanners, carpenters and military men; urge all the elegant pursuits, but have no transactions relating to houses or lands, or their use no transactions relating to houses or lands, or their use or improvement.

20—Thursday. Keep a bridle upon the tongue during the forenoon when thou shouldst be deliberate in all thine undertakings; do not make purchases for trade nor speculate in stocks during this day; keep watch of the purse and practice economy as to personal gratifications.

21—Friday. Conditions during the first half of this day are generally unfavorable and discourage the making of contracts of a commercial nature; do no correspondence of magnitude nor expect any success in the literary undertakings; the afternoon is more favorable and encourages dealings with large corporations, public officials and persons noted for eccentricity of habits or dress.

clais and persons noted for eccentrative of hands dress.

best and should be given preference for the great undertakings in life; do not seek promotion in office or any favor from thy superior in the early part of the day nor be surprised if thine undertakings lag during the afternoon.

23—Sunday. Avoid rashness of word or act and be not easily moved to wrath; the mind is especially active and religious discourse will be earnest and aggressive; have dealings with the aged in the evening.

24—Monday. An excellent day, in which important enterprises will be well begun, especially if they pertain to the elegant occupations or polite arts; the day is particularly fortunate for the purchase or sale of wearing apparel and all fancy and ornamental goods.

25—Tuesday. Bright and prosperous are the conditions of this day and REGULUS advises his commercial and literary friends to urge their business to the very utmost, giving preferences, so far as may be, to the foremon hours; travel, employ help, sign writings, employ lawyers, buy goods for trade, adjust accounts and do most important correspondence; as the evening hours approach make no application for favor nor expect much advantage or satisfaction from social engagements or from musical or theatrical entertainments.

26—Wedneaday. The very early hours of the day are the best, but as the forenoon advances do not ask any favors of thy landlord or of real estate men generally; nor should much benefit be expected from dealings with contractors or any persons engaged in the dirty avocations in life; indecision and forgetfulness will be common faults and melancholy will affect the minds of many just at this time. Use the middle hours of this day to the utmost, but in the afternoon unusual caution will be required to avoid money losses; do not make any investment of means in speculative ventures; do not buy any goods for trade or begin any transactions with moneyed men or banking institutions, and practice economy in dispensing thy worldly goods in any direction.

always plenty of good opportunities for clever, brainy people who are always alert and ready to grasp a real good thing. We have built up our enormous business by being alert and liberal in our GRAND GOLD FREE DISTRIBUTIONS.

We are continually offering our readers RARE AND UNUSUAL prizes. This special contest we consider one of the greatest offers ever made. Do not delay in giving this matter your immediate attention, and if you can spell out the three cities send your answer at once. $1,000.00 REWARD will be paid to any one who can prove that in the many Free Cash Contests we have conducted in the past years, we did not do exactly as we agreed. We have a big capital, and anyone can easily ascertain about our financial condition. To pay out these big gold cash prizes is a pleasure to us. We intend to have the largest circulation of our high-class one-dollar magazine in the world. In this progressive age publishers find that they must be liberal in giving away prizes of great sums of money. It is the only successful way to get your magazine talked about. For instance, if you should solve the peculiar way we have of spelling the names of the three cities, and we should hand you a sum of money as a free prize, you would never stop talking about our magazine, now, would you? We POSITIVELY CLAIM that these three lines of figures, by our plan, do actually spell the names of the recities and that a qever, brainy person, who can think and will patiently endeavor to solve how it is done, will be amply rewarded by sharing in our $1,000.00 in Gold Free Offer. # Blood Poison Cured Free

The Remedy is Sent Absolutely Free to Every Man or Woman Sending Name and Address.

A celebrated Indiana Physician has discovered the most wonderful cure for Blood Poison ever known. It quickly cures all such indications as mucous patches in the mouth, sore throat, copper colored spots, ulcerations on the body and in hundreds of cases where the hair and eyebrows had fallen out and the whole skin was a mass of boils, pimples and ulcers. this wonderful specific has completely changed the whole body into a clean, perfect condition of physical health.

William McGrath, 48 Guilford St., Buffalo, N. Y., says: "I am a well man to-day where a year ago I was a total wreck. Several doctors had failed to cure me of blood poison. I was rid of my sores and my skin became smooth and natural in two weeks, and after completing the treatment there was not a sore or pimple on my body, and to-day I am absolutely well. I give you permission to use my name and I will answer all inquiries from suffering men." Every railroad running into Ft. Wayne brings scores of sufferers seeking this new and marvelous cure and to enable those who cannot travel to realize what a truly marvelous work the doctor is accomplishing they will send free to every sufferer a free trial package of the remedy so that everyone can cure themselves in the privacy of their own home. This is the only known treatment that cures this most terrible of all diseases. Address the State Medical Institute, 3905 Elektron Building, Ft. Wayne, Ind. Do not hesitate to write at once and the free trial package will be sent sealed in plain package.

The Family Doctor.

omany inquiries are received by COMFORT concerning the health of the family that a column will be devoted to answering them. The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be referred to physicians, not to us. Address The Family Doctor. Comfort, Augusta, Maine.

O. S. B., Van Wert, Ohio.—"Yellow janders," as it is sometimes called, though "jaundice" is the proper term, is a disease that requires a physician's attention, ordinarily, but in a less pronounced form, when it is a little more than an aggravated attack of biliousness, it may be self-treated, and this rather as a prevention than a cure. To begin with, you should take regular exercise in the open air and eat plain, nourishing and easily digestible food, and do not eat too much. Digestible food is such as you can digest, which you may know only by trying, and can not be known any other way, because what may be digestible food to one person is not to another. As a medicine which is also a remedy for liver trouble and dropsy get the following prescription filled at your druggist's: Eightounces infusion of dandelion; one-half ounce extract of dandelion; two drachms carbonate of soda; six drachms tartrate of potassa; eight drachms tincture of rhubarb; one and one-half ounces tincture of henbane. Dose, atablespoonful every two hours. This may be just what you need, but if it is not, you can not do better than put yourself in a physician's care and do what he tells you.

yourself in a physician's care and do what he tells you.

Pleased Subscriber, Crestline, Ohio.—Enlargement of the glands of the neck is too serious a matter to be treated through a column of this kind. Consult your physician. (2) Not knowing of the causes of your red and rough skin, it is rather difficult to prescribe. Diet and exercise, with judicious washing are always of good effect. Some of the advertised medicines for cutaneous affections are excellent. A glycerine varnish left on the face over night may produce good results. It is made of four parts of yolk of egg, (by weight), rubbed in a mortar with five parts of glycerine. This applied to the skin makes a coating which protects it from the irritating effects of the air. It is readily washed off. (3) The use of hair removers is not recommended. As they are frequently used, however, we give you one which is said to be very effective, and no more harmful than any of the others: Sulphydrate of soda, one hundred grains; chalk, three hundred grains. Make into a thin paste with water and apply to hairy part. After a few moments scrape off with a blunt edged knife. The mixture destroys the hair and the knife scrapes it off. It is effective but is not permanent.

H. K. L., Franklin, Ky.—First keep your boy away from gun powder. Since it is too late for that advice, you may find the following of benefit in removing the discolorations: Smear the scorched surface with glycerine applied on a feather, then apply cotton wadding and cover with oiled silk. This remedy has been known to remove all discolorations from a powder-burned face that was almost solid blue.

Mrs. D. O. F., Jackson, Wyo.—Oil of brown paper is an oid-fashioned remedy for burns, which used to be considered very good. It is made by dipping thick brown paper into the best salad (olive) oil and burning the paper on a plate and catching the oil. Apply to the burn and keep protected from the air.

Old Man, Mauston, Wis.—There are several simple remedies for running sores on the legs. One is to wash them in brandy and apply elder leaves, changing twice a day. This is said to dry them up effectually. Another remedy is to poultice with rotten apples. These are for local applications; with them you should take a good dose of Epsom or other salts every morning before breakfast, and diet yourself.

Smoker Bockdale Pa—The capter or plears in Smoker, Rockdale, Pa.—The canker or ulcers in your mouth are no doubt the result of too much tobacco. Smoke less, and a wash of carbolic acid or permanganate of potash will prove effective in removing them. Put one part of acid or permanganate to one hundred parts of water. Do not swallow any of the wash. Both are poison if taken internally.

swallow any of the wash. Both are poison if taken internally.

Hoosier, Shoals, Ind.—There is no better remedy for ague than quinine, but in your neighborhood, possibly you need something more vigorous. An excellent remedy, and what is said to be a cure, as far as the person and not the locality are concerned, is compounded as follows: To five teaspoonfuls of water, add fifty drops tincture gelseminum and ten grains of quinine. Shake well before using and administer one teaspoonful in a wineglass of sugar and water every two hours. This medicine may affect your head and eyesight and make you weak, but these symptoms will pass away if you discontinue the use of the medicine, and you will be in very fair condition, if not entirely relieved. These directions must be followed carefully as gelseminum is dangerous if used after its effects have become apparent.

Mother, Santiago, Mo.—A simple and safe vermifuge is powdered iron rust. It expels the worms and acts as a tonic and strengthener. From ten to forty grains may be given to a child from five to seven years old, and a quarter of an ounce to an adult. Give it in molasses or in beer, and follow it with an aperient.

Guardian, Wilton, Maine.—Whooping cough is not dangerous, except in extreme cases, if properly

It with an aperient.

Guardian, Wilton, Maine.—Whooping cough is not dangerous, except in extreme cases, if properly attended to. A safe remedy is composed of one scruple carbonate of potassa; one grain cochineal dissolved in six ounces of water sweetened with sugar. Dose: one teaspoonful three times a day for children of four years and upwards, and half as much for younger children. To be taken before meals.

meals.

Farmer, Waterloo, Ala.—Lockjaw is a disease resulting from microbes, and these are especially numerous and dangerous in the ground, ordinary loam. A nail that has lain in the earth about the house or stable will, if run into the flesh, almost invariably produce lockjaw in man or beast. There is no sure cure for it, but a remedy which may prevent it, and will certainly greatly relieve it, is warm turpentine poured directly into the wound wherever it may be located. Of course a physician should be called at once. Never wait a moment, thinking it will amount to nothing, if you wound yourself in any way with iron or other hard substance that has been lying in the ground. And if you have any cut places or other open wounds on your hands or feet, be careful how you get earth into them.

into them.

Lady, Versailles, Conn.—An effective remedy for ordinary sick stomach and vomiting is made by mixing twenty-four drops creosote, one drachm each white sugar and gum arabic with three ounces of water. Take a teaspoonful every two hours of water. Take a tea until vomiting ceases.

until vomiting ceases.

Cardemon, Napoleon, Ohio.—We have given above a remedy for ague, but your case seems to be beyond the reach of medicine, and there is no relief for you except to remove to some part of the country where ague does not exist. There are such places in Ohio, and in every state in the Union—plenty of them. In fact, ague districts in this country are the exception, not the rule. You will never be well where you are, and the sooner you get away the better will be your chances for ultimate recovery.

J. K., Overbrook, Kans.—Vours is a simple control.

J. K., Overbrook, Kans.—Yours is a simple case of overwork. You may think that you can work as you say you do, and be well, but you can not, and you will either have to rest or die. It is entirely with you, and if you think it is better to kill yourself trying to make more money, than it is to live and enjoy a smaller amount, we have no further advice to give.

The above list is selected from thousands of names arranged alphabetically in a little book entitled "COMFORT'S LIST OF HEIRS." The names represent persons who have either been advertised for in a daily newspaper in the United States or Great Britain as heirs to money or property or in whose names there stands unclaimed estates in the British Court of Chancery.

FORTUNES ARE WAITING FOR PEOPLE TO CLAIM THEM.

Thousands of persons living in the United States, and in fact all over the world, have been and are being advertised for to claim money or property, and very large amounts are awaiting the claims of the persons advertised for, or their Next-of-Kin Heirs and Legal Representatives. As these advertisements in most cases appear but once or twice and in one or two papers only, they are never seen by the persons interested, who are in consequence entirely ignorant that they are entitled to any money or property. COMFORT has already on file thousands of these advertisements, and the names of persons so advertised for will be found in "COMFORT'S LIST OF HEIRS."

A Game of Confidence

WRITTEN FOR COMFORT BY HENRY DOBBINS

Copyright, 1902, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher.

HEN the police court reporter of the great city mewspaper slipped around into the cell room of the police station he did it with the hope that he might find something to write about for his readers the ning of the hard benches, with one exception. This exception was a sharp-eyed man evidently not long a prisoner and waiting for some friend to come to his rescue with bail. He was peering through the bars in an eager, curious kind of a way.

"Ah," said the reporter in the same tone he would have used if he had found a new dollar in the street, "how are you? What are you dody in merel" to be bailed out," he replied.

The prisoner eyed him as if he were some one trying to catch him napping.

"I beg your pardon," said the reporter with mock apologies. "I didn't know whether you were in for something or merely because you only looked like you ought to be."

The prisoner began to laughso immoderately that the prisoners near him trying to sleep on their hard beds were disturbed and rose on their elbows to swear at the laughter.

"By low," he went on after a minute, "that he had been to be a supprised it to the them to be a supprised of the cell," he added as he sat down on his bench. "You see I can't very well invite you to come in and sit here with me, but I'll tell, you how it was. You're a reporter, of course."

The reporter admitted the mild impeachment. "You can't help being what you are any more than I can help being what you are any more than I can help being what you are any more than I can help being what you are any more than I can help being what you are any more than I can help being what you are any more than I can help being what you are any more than I can help being what you are any more than I can help being what you are any more than I can help being what you are any more than the supprised of the course

"As you know, Philadelphia is a mighty nice place for prayer meetings and matters of that kind, so my partner and me lit out for the Pennsylvania depot and grabbed the first train we could, holding on to the carpet bag which we had wrapped up in a newspaper. We emptied it as soon as we got a chance and stuck the money which was done up in bundles in our pockets. If his wife's photo was there we didn't see it, but we did see some packages of the rankest smelling stuff I ever stuck nose to, that I suppose he put in to preserve the money with. I know it made us sick and sickened half the people in the car but we didn't dare give ourselves away by examining the bundles, and we couldn't throw the precious money out of the window. We just had to stick to it and keep mum till we got to Jersey City where we dropped off the train before it had stopped, and slipped around to a quiet place where we could divide our find and scatter for safety. The plan we had laid out was all right, but when it come to the division part of it would not work at all. My partner was agreeable and so was I, but Fill be roasted if there was anything for us to to a quiet place where we could divide our find and scatter for safety. The plan we had laid out was all right, but when it come to the division part of it would not work at all. My partner was agreeable and so was I, but I'll be roasted if there was anything for us to divide. The foxyy old hayseed had worked us instead of us working him, and he not only got his supper and a whole lot of drinks at our expense, but he had insulted us besides, for the bundles that we thought had money in them, had brown paper that had been soaked to some the force of the bundles that we thought had money in them, had brown paper that had been soaked to some the force of the solution of the bundles that we thought had money in the bundles that we thought had been soaked to some the force of the solution of the bundles that we thought had money in them, had brown paper that had been soaked to some the force of the solution of t in the worst smelling stuff I ever stuck my nose to, and in one of them was a note in ong red letters which said: 'When you fish for hayseed get the right kind of bait.' We just looked at each other, and we was that sore if we had that old shark and deceiver there we would have done him up to the Queen's taste, and his bones never would have fertilized the soil of Pennsylvania. See?"

"What became of him and his real money?" inquired the reporter, who saw quite clearly. "How do I know?" laughed the prisoner. "When a man in my business loses a good thing he don't usually go 'round trying to discover who has found it, does he?"

A woman's discovery By many years of constant study and experiments I have perfected a simple, harmiess vegetable remedy that will quickly cure all female diseases, as well as the piles. It is nature's own remedy and will not only relieve, but will absolutely, thoroughly and permanently cure the aliments peculiar to women, such as falling of the womb, leucorrhea (whites), displacements, ulceration, granulation, painful or scanty periods, irregular menstruation and all the pelvic ills of women. It positively cures rectal ulcers, piles hemorrholds, tumors, itching, blind or bleeding piles in either sex. It cures promptly, privately and permanently without the repugnant methods in general use by physicians. You can escape embarrassing eximinations, avoid humiliating exposures, cheat the surgeon's knife out of baptism in your blood.

The treatment is so simple, naild and effectual that it will not interfere with your work or occupation. Thousands and thousands of letters are being received from grateful persons from all parts of the world who have been cured by the use of this remedy. The first package is free, send for it—send to-day, I know that a fair trial of it will result in your becoming its enthusiastic advocate and friend. With it I will send literature of interest and value. Do not neglect this opportunity to get cured yourself and be in a position to advise ailing friends.

Consider well the above offer and act upon it at once. It is made in the sincere hope of aiding you and spreading the knowledge of a beneficent boon to sufferers. Earnestly, hopefully, faithfully, Mas. Cora B. Miller, I Comstock Bidg, Kokemo, Ind.

COMFORT'S 15th VOLUME ANNOUNCEMENT!

With this issue COMFORT completes its fourteenth volume. A glance over our back files shows that each volume has shown a marked improvement over the last. With the next issue of COMFORT we shall enter upon our sifteenth volume, and we promise that this volume shall not only be better than the one now closed but that it shall be better than all the other fourteen put together. We have arranged a programme of serial stories, short stories and special articles (all illustrated from photographs) which with our regular departments will not be excelled by any magazine in the country costing four times the subscription price of COM. FORT. In fact we cannot give on this page our full programme, but we will enumerate below some of the stories and special articles which will open the new volume.

Love Stories! Stories of Mystery!! Stories of Adventure!!!

Or Who Killed Kathleen O'Neal.

By May Agnes Fleming.

This is one of the most interesting stories we have ever read. It commences in the October number of COMFORT, and we are certain that those who once commence to read it will be the commence to read it will be the commence to read it will be seen that the opening chapter to the opening chapter to the last. month's instalment appears. It is a story of We predict that this will be one of the most prairies and tells of the adventure of the hero venture of "Tom and Florence" will be equally love, murder and intrigue.

Under Love's Spell, A Girl's Vengeance; Or, The Crime at Hazel Hall.

By Etta W. Pierce.

successful stories ever published by COMFORT. among the Red Skins.

Jack Harkaway Out West Among the Indians. Or the Fortunes of a Young

By Bracebridge Hemyng.

Successful Paul, Street Merchant.

By Horatio Alger, Jr.

interested in the fortunes of "Successful Paul."

Some Special Articles Which Will Appear in Early Numbers.

THE MACHINERY OF CONGRESS.

BY WALDON FAWCETT.

This is a most interesting article by a well known magazine writer. Mr. Fawcett compares the United States Senate and the House of Representatives to small rival towns. Each has a bank, a post office, fire and police departments, electric lighting systems, restaurants, barber shops, libraries and other necessities of a modern community. The article gives an inside account of the doings of Congress and contains much that will be new to our readers. The article is illustrated from photographs.

UNCLE SAM'S SEED DISTRIBUTION.

By Our Washington Correspondent.

Almost all rural residents in the United States are deeply interested in the great free distribution of flower and vegetable seeds made each year from Washington under the direction of the United States Department of Agriculture. Only those, however, who have visited the Department in Washington appreciate the vastness of this enterprise. This article is illustrated by photographs showing the ingenious machines each of which fill and seal seventy envelopes a minute.

Forestry as a Profession for Young Men.

BY GIFFORD PINCHOT.

A new career open to American youth is that of forestry. The Department of Agriculture at Washington has organized a Bureau of Forestry, and one of the greatest difficulties it has to contend with is the scarcity of men suitably trained to fill the position. Mr. Pinchot, who has written this article especially for COMFORT, is the greatest authority on forestry in this country. When only twenty-seven years old he laid out Vanderbilt's famous park at Biltmore.

Opportunities in Cuba for the American Farmer. BY ALBERT G. ROBINSON.

Mr. Robinson is one of the few Americans who know Cuba almost as well as their native land. He has visited Cuba when the country was prosperous and when it was poor. In this article he shows the opportunities for the American farmer in a land where there are no long cold winters, where the farmer needs no woodpile, and where there are no paths to shovel on cold winter mornings and no milking to be done with half frozen fingers.

If You Could But See This Book: We would like to have every reader of COMFORT personally see and examine this grand Dictionary. A number of course are already supplied with a good dictionary, but to assist those of our readers who may be in need of such a complete dictionary we have made very favorable arrangements with the publishers to distribute a certain number among our subscription workers Scholars should have a good dictionary at home to assist them with their studies. In every household they are essential, in Schools, Factories Offices, anywhere in fact, as we are constantly seeing words in the daily press that we are unfamiliar with and a good reliable dictionary right at hand would be found well worth its cost many times in a year.

Scholars and teachers can do no better than to make up a club of subscribers among themselves and secure a copy of this Big Dictionary for the school room and have at hand at all times a reliable source for general information as well as a complete pronouncing and spelling dictionary.

This Dictionary treats exhaustively on the most important subjects of recent interest. The Wars in China, Transvaal, Philippines, and Cuba, etc. Authentic knowledge of these subjects is most essential to every one watching the world's progress, and this department has been treated by master hands and is full of valuable, forcible facts.

The Complete Webster Dictionary, is a grand, big book, 10 3-4 inches in height, 12 inches in width, and over 4 inches thick. Contains over 1700 pages, gives the spelling, pronunciation, abbreviations and defines 135,000 words and is authority the world over.

A TURTLE TAPE MEASURE.

A Writing Tablet without End.

A Labor and Money Saver.

For Scholars, Business Men, Bankers, in fact every human being no matter what he or she is doing has some use for a writing table. Comfort offers this article on its merits, and they are so many that you will at once appreciate its value. It is useful in so many ways that but a few will be mentioned, others will suggest themselves.

THE DANGEROUS SLATE. So many instances of fatal results from the use of slates and slate pencils that the use of the old-fashioned slate has been forbidden in a great many States and in other States they have been abolished from the schools. Ordinary tablets of writing paper suitable for school work are an endless expense to the parent of one or more scholars, but to assist in education they must be provided, for where is the parent who will have an ignorant child when in these days of plenty most every necessity to assist in learning can be secured reasonably?

will have an ignorant child when in these days of plenty most evereasonably?

EDUCATE AND SAVE. Here's where we hope to appeal to our readers. A COMFORT Writing Tablet like our illustration containing one roll of paper eight inches long and two inches in diameter is sufficient for one year as the tablet does not allow waste and only the required amount of paper is used.) The tablet itself is absolutely indestructible, will go through a school boy row and come out on top sound and whole.

EARN AND OWN FOR YOURSELF. The bright boy or girl don't live who has not got the "get up and get" to secure enough subscribers to COMFORT before school to earn one of these "COMFORT" Writing Tablets, and where is the scholar who would not prefer to have one of these New Idea Tablets, earned by their own hands, than an ordinary block of paper bought at the store.

by their own hands, than an ordinary block of paper bought as the store.

But scholars are not the only ones among our readers needing this useful and economical tablet. Think of having it near a telephone, in the kitchen for grocery memorandum, around factories, lumber mills and railroads. Its usefulness and great convenience suggest its use to all of us. Where they tories, lumber mills and railroads. Its usefulness and great convenience suggest its use to all of us. Where they are in use they are very popular. We want you to have one and to have it NOW. Our fliustration gives some idea of its appearance and it is so very simple that a child five years old can use it as well as older persons. using shot that can be obtained anywhere at a trifling expense, also shoots darts making it desirable for outdoor target practice or parlor amusement or it-can be used in any part of the house with perfect safety, making a practical and entertaining form of evening amusement for the boys and girls as well as older folks. There is no smoke, odor or dust from this gun, it is endorsed by army officers as the best mechanical rifle ever produced and the possession of one of our accurate shooting air rifles makes a boy manly and affords him an excellent means of successfully competing with his chums for marksman's honors as well as teaching him the use of a rifle. Remember this is a combination gun, so your boy should have one be he old or young. If he is sick in the house he can shoot darts and keep out of mischief or go into the woods for game and get robust and healthy besides.

SPECIAL. Send at once for sample copies of our big monthly and subscribtion blanks and canvass amoghe the neighbors. ## HIGH GRADE NINE RIB MANDOLIN.

There is no musical instrument giving more delightful strains of soft, sweet music than a Mandolin. This is particularly so of this instrument we offer, in fact it is made so well and thoroughly that the factory could not continue on the meager profits. The materials entering into the make up of this instrument are all first quality, selected prepared woods, two kinds, Mahogany and Maple, in two colors, carefully put together with a fancy inlay between each strip and around sound hole, imitation tortoise shell guard plate, rosew ad finger board, inlaid pearl positions, nickle tail piece and trimmings, eight strings together with tortoise shell picker, green bag and instruction book, a complete outfit that is bound to delight. This mandolin embodies the perfect and ingenious form of an original instrument brought to this country many years ago, its perfect shape is an exact copy art is covered by several patents. This you should consider as you can not get the same pure sweet resonance from instruments of inferior make and it is just these things that go to make a Mandolin attractive.

For a club of only 10 yearly trial subscribers to our magazine at 25c. each per year we will send our magazine to each a whole year and give you one of the mandolins as a free reward for your effort.

A GREAT WINTER'S GAME.

THE POPULAR GAME OF TABLE TENNIS

also called Wick-Waff and Ping-Pong, has the favor this season and every one everywhere is playing morning, noon and night. Parties are in order and the fascination for the game catches the average person of any age. The game is played on any size table, a dining table is most suitable, and the outfit consists of a net, two rackets and balls. The young people and old people all want to play and become experts. It can be played in the house, on the veranda or on the grass. Any place is desirable where a suitable table can be placed with plenty of light. There is something indescribably fascinating about the game, and thousands play who never cared for or would play Tennis. Next winter Table Tennis will be the only home amusement. Even now the rich people who have their own private billiard rooms have these Table Tennis Sets and are playing the game on their Billiard or Pool Table and find great amusement and pleasure. Every one in the cities is playing and talking "Ping-Pong." You want to be up to date and have a set in the home to entertain your visitors with. We have several sets to offer, one for the young people or beginners, the other for more advanced players and older persons.

20th Century MUSICAL WONDER.

With little practice any one can produce the most charming music on this latest of musical wonders The Magic Harmonophoue. It is a complete Orchestra and Pull Brass Band all in one. It is a delightful instrument to play upon. Every one knows what the large horn used on a Phonograph is for, it is to increase, modulate, doors so that a light voice can be carried fully a mile and distinctly understood. The same principle has been used in producing the Harmonophone. We take the very best quality and sweetest toned Harmonica that is made and attach it to the Nickle Metai "Phone?" which is so arranged that the notes coming from the Harmonica are carried around the bell of the Phone which produces the most melodious notes that can emerge from a Silver Nickle hora. Any one who can play a common mouth organ can operate this great wonder and by manipulating the hand over the mouth of the Phone the most startling and beautiful effects can be produced. The single, double and triple "tongueing" feat is delightfully performed when the Harmonophone is used and with each instrument we send special instructions how to get perfect results and teach you how to play to perfection any familiar air in a highly original and brillant manner. You can get so much music from this instrument that you can give concerts, play for company or turnisa dance music even for the whole crowd and as the mouth organs can be detached from the Phone they will last a lifetime and you can thus play in several different keys by only having one Phone.

SPECIAL OFFEER. If you will send us a club of only two trial 25c. yearly subscriptions, we will send our magazine one year to each and the Harmonophone and full instructions to you postpaid in a strong wood box.

desolation, since he was not there.

"Give you good-even, my pretty Kathleen," said a soft, low voice that Kathleen knew well, and a whiff of scented cigar-smoke puffed in her face. "On my life, you make a very charming picture, my dear. I never wished I were an artist until this moment. Come here to see the sun go down, eh? Ah, well!" with a lazy sigh. "Neat thing in the way of sunsets, too. How's the dear old dad?"

Kathleen rose up with a bound, flushing rosy red, and dropping an embarrassed little courtesy. A tall man stood before her—a gentlemanly looking personage of thirty or thereabouts, well dressed, well looking, with a shadowy resemblance in his light-blue eyes and fair hair to the gold-haired, azure-eyed darling of her heart. He was not one hundredth part so handsome, but he vaguely resembled Lord Roderick Desmond, and was that young lordling's third cousin—the penniless son of a penniless younger brother, and a barrister at law, of Lincoln's Inn, London.

He looked much more like an Englishman than an Irish Desmond, with his carefully trained side-whiskers, his slow, languid voice, and his affectation of utter indifference to all things under the sun.

"Mr. Gerald!" Kathleen cried; "you here! I than an Irish Desmond, with his carefully trained side-whiskers, his slow, languid voice, and his affectation of utter indifference to all things under the sun.

"Mr. Gerald!" Kathleen cried; "you here! I didn't know—I thought you were—"

"At home, as I should be—very likely. But hard work all summer has used me up, and I've taken a run over to Clontart to freshen for the autumn and winter campaign. 'Men must work and women must weep'; and they avail themselves of their prerogative, the dear, moist creatures, to the full, I must say, equally at weddings and deaths. You don't know the song of the 'Three Fishers,' I dare say, Kathleen, but you look as though you had gone in for the weeping business yourself, of late. Six weeks ago I saw you as blooming as one of your own Irish roses; now a belle of five seasons could hardly look more chalky and haggard than my wild, fresh Wicklow rosebud. Is it speedy consumption, Kathie, or a more fatal disease—crossed in love?"

He took the cigar from between his lips and bent toward her, a keenly knowing look in his small, light-blue eyes.

He and little Kathleen knew each other well—from the days when he, atall, hobbledehoylof sixteen, had been "coached" by old O'Neal, a decayed gentleman and a thorough classical scholar,—and had romped with the prettiest four-year-old fairy in the county.

Old O'Neal had been proud of his clever pupil; and Gerald Desmond was a regular visitor at the cottage of his old preceptor during his flying visits to Clontarf.

He had seen Rory and Kathleen together more times than he could count, and he had pulled his long, blonde whiskers and smiled sardonically at Rory's boyish devotion and Kathleen's innocent blushes.

He bent over Kathleen now, and saw the red blood rising to the low, fair brow, and the hot mist that filled the soft blue eyes.

"Rory hasn't been to the cottage for the past six weeks, I dare swear," he said, carelessly. "He is taken up by night and by day, sleeping and waking, body and soul, with that dark-eyed donna from old Castil and waking, body and soul, with that darkeyed donna from old Castile. Seen her yet, Kathleen?"

He could see the tempestuous heaving of Kathleen's breast, the passionate cloud of jealousy that darkened her whole fair face.

"Yes; I have seen her—again and again and again!"

"And she is beautiful as one's dreams of the angels, eh? She is lovely as an houri, and—you hate her as Old Nick hates holy water!"

"Mr. Gerald! I?"

"You, Kathleen—for this reason: Rory has gone mad for her. Ah, what an impetuous, hot-headed, reckless, hare-brained fellow that is! On my word, it takes my breath away only to think of him! And impetuosity is so very pronounced, and in such excessive bad style!
But he is madly in love; and really the Senorita d'Alvarez is very well worth loving—supposing that anything is worth getting the steam up to such a pitch here below. She's a royal beauty; she's the heiress of a millionaire, with shares and bonds, and consols and coupons, and castles in Spain and bank stock in England.
Only it would be such an infinite deal of trouble, I would fall in love with her and marry her myself."

"I wish you would," Kathleen said, between her clinched, pearly teeth. "Why did she ever leave Spain? Why did she ever come—"

"Here—between you and Rory? Ah! why, indeed? You see, Kathie, the don married an English woman, rich beyond all telling, and beautiful as—her daughter. Donna Inez has spent her whole life in a Spanish convent, in Valadana, I believe, and Don Pedro and his English donna went in for high life in our modern Vanity Fair—Paris. Then the English lady dies, and the Spanish papa waxes lonely, goes to the convent, claims his daughter, and starts with her for England, to present her to her English relatives by the distaff side, and—the ship catches fire off the Irish coast, and the crew take to the boats, and the two passengers are forgotten in the hubbub, and Master Rory and his yacht arrive in the nick of time to bear off the shrieking beauty from the devouring flames—a modern St. George and th Dragom. You've not read many novels in your life-time, my Kathleen, and you're all the better for it; but if you had, you wouldn't need me to tell you the sequel to this delightful romance. The curtain invariably falls, after a score or two of such tremendous sensations, on the crowning folly of man—marriage."

"Marriage!" Kathleen repeated, her breath coming short and quick—"marriage, Mr. Gerald! Will Lord Roderick marry her?"

"I think it extremely likely. As I said, he is in a state of utter imbecility about her, and she—well, those impassioned, tall, black-eyed, dark-skinned, fiery-blooded southrons are generally the very devil either to love or hate. And Rory's thews and sinews, his six foot of stature, his yellow locks and his blue eyes have made their mark already. The lady's good-looking, as you know, Kathleen, and Donna De Castilia is susceptible. In spite of papa's recent death, and her trailing crape and sables, she looks graciously already on the future Earl of Clontarf. Yes, Miss O'Neal, I think I will be called upon to draw up the marriage settlements for my lordly cousin before the world wags twelve months longer."

She was tearing up the turf with a flerce, suppressed excitement that must find vent somehow. Gerald Desmond glanced at her askance.

"And if I were you, Kathleen, I would take

"Mr. Gerald!"

"Mr. Gerald!"

She turned upon him, her pale cheeks flushing, her eyes flashing in the twilight.

"Don't flare up, you little Celtic pythoness!
Yes, I would. Morgan's an Englishman and an attorney—heinous crimes both, in your eyes and your father's; but for all that, you can't do better. He's well to do; he'll make a lady of you, or a lady on a small scale, and no one need ever apply to you that nasty little word, jilted!"

"Gerald Desmond! How dare you?"

"She turned upon him, her pale cheeks flushing her eyes flashing in the twilight.

"Don't flare up, you little Celtic pythoness!
Yes, I would. Morgan's an Englishman and the service you of the service yourself, or you, or a lady on a small scale, and no one need ever apply to you that nasty little word, jilted!"

"Gerald Desmond! How dare you?"
Gerald Desmond shrugged his shoulders, and smiled. He rarely laughed.

"Coming the tragic muse, eh? Pray, don't excite yourself, my dear. I'm talking like a father to you. I met Morgan down there be yant, as they say here, and he begged me most pitcously to put in a good word for him. You've lost Lord Roderick, you see; and I give you my word, Kathleen, I thought at one time his little flirtation would have ended seriously. But he has gone down beyond hope before the Spanish eyes of the Castilian beauty, and your cake's dough. Marry Morgan, like a good ogirl, and live happy forever after."

She clutched a handful of grass, and flung it passionately over the rocks.

She clutched a handful of grass, and flung it passionately over the rocks.

"Horgan! I hate him!"

"Poor fellow!" said Morgan's intercessor, plaintively. "But per home the seed the passionately over the rocks and states are thousand deaths, I would impring the tragic and the property of the seating of the passionately over the rocks and the seating of the passionately over the rocks.

"Horgan! I hate him!"

"Poor fellow!" said Morgan's intercessor, plaintively. "But you'll marry some one, some time, you know, Kathleen. It's woma's destiny, the end and aim of her whole lifemarriage."

"Horgan! I hate him!"

"Poor fellow!" said Morgan's intercessor, plaintively. "Grant and aim of her whole lifemarriage."

"Horgan! I hate him!"

"Poor fellow!" said Morgan's intercessor, plaintively. "Grant and sellow him and the grant and princess. They will go to make me the passion of the property of the seating of the passion of the passi bans."

"What do you mean?"
"Why this, little one: the donns is as proud as the deuce—all these high and mighty Spanish beauties are—and as jealous as the devil.
Go up to the castle, insist on an interview, tell her Rory is yours, not hers, that your claim to him is beyond dispute. So it is, you know; he has been courting you ever since he was three feet high. Tell her he loves you still, and is only after her doubloons. By Jove! Kathleen, she'll drop him like a hot potato."

"Mr. Gerald!"

"Lord Roderick Desmond and Donna Inez," said Gerald Desmond. "Has he asked her already to be his wife? It would be very like him, impetuous that he is; and very like her, passionate and impulsive, to say yes. Well, good night, Kathleen, and pleasant dreams."

He touched his hat carelessly and turned away, humming an old song as he went:

(TRADE MARK)

"'Thou hast learned to love another, Thou hast broken every vow—'" and each word went through the girl's heart like a knife. Where he had left her, she crouched down, her face hidden in her hands, with the low, dumb moan of a stricken animal.

Gerald Desmond walked slowly homeward, in the silvery light of the moon, to Clontarf Castle. His pale face was at all times fixedly calm, but his light, cold eyes gleamed with an evil gleam. For he coveted this Spanish beauty with his whole soul, for her rare loveliness, that had fired his cold blood, for her great wealth, that maddened him with covetness, that nad hered his great wealth, that maddened him with covetous desire.

With such a prize as this Spanish princess for a wife there was no eminence in the kingdom that he, with his shrewd brain and crafty cleverness, might not attain.

He hated and envied his cousin, with a bitter and terrible envy, all the more deadly from being so closely hidden; but he had never in his whole life before hated him so vindictively as he did tonight.

"I have hated you in secret for many a year you shallow-brained, mad-headed fool!" he said, with a gleam of devilish malignity in his light eyes; "the time has come to act now. Woo your black-eyed bride—win her if you can. If you ever lead her to the altar, if you ever slip the wedding-circlet on her finger, then 'exite me down an ass!' I love lnez d'Alvarez, and mine she shall be—mine! I have said it, and we Desmonds keep our word. When her wedding-day comes, unlikely as it looks it, and we Desmonds keep our word. When her wedding-day comes, unlikely as it looks now, I will stand at the altar by her side, and you will be—where,—Lord Roderick?"
